DESCRIPTION:

Located in rural Norway Township, not far from the crossroads hamlet of Bratsberg, the Overland House is a rectangular, two-story, rough coursed ashlar stone building with shingled gable roof. The house is oriented with the east-west roof ridge parallel to the road and front property line. A gable roof dormer is centered over the symmetrical primary (south) facade. Fenestration consists of six-over-six double-hung sash in symmetrically arranged segmental arch openings, and the front door is centered beneath the dormer and sheltered by a large wood frame porch. A fixed multi-light sash is located in the end gable.

SIGNIFICANCE:

The Overland House is significant for its association with the Norwegian immigrant settlement of Fillmore County and particularly with Norway Township, one of the earliest and largest Norwegian settlements in southeastern Minnesota. The Norwegian dominance of the area is indicated by the township name which was given, according to an 1882 account, "in honor of the native country of almost every inhabitant of the township." In addition, the house is noteworthy for its vernacular stone masonry construction in a style unlike other stone houses in the county, having a broad and very symmetrical facade. The township was first settled in 1854 by the family of John Olson Overland whose descendants now own the house. The particular property upon which the house is situated was owned by Norwegian immigrant farmers from 1854 until the early decades of the twentieth century. It is believed that the house was constructed during the early 1870s during the ownership of Hans Franson (who heavily mortgaged the land in 1872 and 1873), followed in 1874 by Ole Hendrickson. Today the Overland House has become a landmark for residents of the area.
