NARRATIVE DESCRIPTION

The Poindexter Park Historic District is a small late-nineteenth and early-twentieth century neighborhood, located in an area historically known as "West Jackson" in the city of Jackson, Hinds County, Mississippi. The district includes most of the Poindexter Subdivision of 1875, bound by properties facing Hunt Street and West Capitol Street (formerly Clinton Road) on the north, Rose Street on the west, West Pearl Street (formerly Sharkey Street) on the south, and Clifton Street on the east.

The district is situated atop one of the few low hills that define the general topography of Jackson. Poindexter Park, the former location of the Poindexter estate, occupies the highest ground in the surrounding neighborhood and is the highest ground between it and the Old State Capitol Building at the terminus of Capitol Street to the east. Internal to the district, the topography is relatively flat in character.

The district is shaped as an irregular pentagon, within which is an equally irregular street plan. The eastern half of the district is characterized by streets running generally north-south without intermediate cross streets. The western half, by comparison, is characterized by blocks created by east-west streets (The east-west streets found in this portion of the district form the eastern end of the regular street grid of West Jackson). In the north-center of the district is an irregular quadrilateral block that contains Poindexter Park, the former grounds of the Poindexter estate following the subdivision of 1875; to its south is a square block containing Echols Junior High School. Together, these two blocks form a "break" between the irregular general street pattern of the eastern portion of the neighborhood, and the rigid gridded street pattern of West Jackson area on the west.

Buildings within the district represent historic land uses ranging from residential to commercial, civic/cultural and religious institutional uses. However, unlike most neighborhoods of a similar type in Jackson, the district possesses a significant collection of property types that cross class lines. Residential property types found here include modest shotguns, double shotguns and modified shotgun, middle-level types such as the side L-plan, composite cottage, double-pile cottage and the bungalow, and more well-to-do types such as the modified townhouse. four-square and the homestead houses. Historic architectural styles found in Poindexter Park include Italianate, Queen Anne, Colonial Revival, Spanish Colonial Revival, Craftsman, and Minimalist Traditional influences.

An inventory of the properties contained within the Poindexter Fark Historic District follows. The properties inventoried which contribute to the historical character of design, workmanship, and materials found in been so altered as to have lost their integrity of design, workmanship, and materials, do not contribute to the historical character of the district, and are identified (NC). There are some buildings which have witnessed substantial alterations, but it may be possible to retrieve their contributing status following careful rehabilitation. These structures are identified (NC*), but are included as non-contributing properties within the overall resource count.

Apart from buildings, there are other contributing resources which reinforce the historical characteristics of the district. These characteristics include the qualities of the general streetscape (#204), the landscape qualities of Poindexter Park (#165), and the site of the Poindexter Estate Complex on the grounds of Poindexter Park (#165c). Each are included within the resource count as one contributing site.

- 012 601 A&B West Capitol St.
  - Two-story, four-bay, brick masonry commercial building with late-Art Modern influence, built ca. 1950. Flat roof with plain parapet, covered with built-up roofing. Windows are five-light fixed and awning casement windows. Above storefront is a cantilevered flat metal canopy. Street level has a canted storefront with a strip of stationary display windows, and side entrances with full-light metal-frame doors. (NC)
- 013 601 C West Capitol St.

One-story, six-bay, brick masonry commercial building with Modern Traditional influence, built ca. 1950. Flat roof with parapet wall topped with a cast concrete coping. Above storefront is a cantilevered flat metal awning. Street level originally contained two storefronts: left storefront has single-light display windows with transom strip and full-light, metal frame door; right storefront has boarded display windows with transom strip above. (NC)

014 603-615 West Capitol St.

One-story, eighteen-bay, brick masonry commercial strip block with Modernist Traditional influence, built ca. 1940. Flat roof behind plain parapet topped with cast concrete coping. Exterior wall surfaces have stucco veneer. A continuous flat metal canopy spans all six storefronts. Storefronts have seen a variety of modifications, but all have single-light, stationary display windows and full-light, metal frame doors. The survival of Carrara glass on some piers and spandrels beneath the storefronts, and the survival of low brick bulkheads gives indications of original storefront treatments. (C)

015 617-619 West Capitol St.

One-story, six-bays, brick masonry commercial building with Art Moderne influence, built ca. 1940. Flat roof behind parapet wall with cast stone coping. Exterior wall surfaces have stucco veneer. A full-width cantilevered metal canopy spans the storefronts. Left storefront has Carrara glass surrounding fixed display windows and side full-light, metal frame door; right storefront altered ca. 1960-65 with multi-light display windows and center full-light, metal-frame door with oversized transom. #### POINDEXTER PARK

165 Poindexter Park

Poindexter Park is a seven and one-half acre urban greenspace, created in ca. 1898. The park occupies the entire block bound by West Capitol, Poindexter, Near and Lemon streets, save for two roughly 50' x 100' out parcel lots at its northernmost corner. The park is largely composed of grassy open space, with minimal landscaping and physical improvements. A concrete sidewalk encircles the street exposures of the park; an interior sidewalk roughly bisects the park running from northwest to southeast, leading to the pavilion (#173a) at its focus. Trees within the park include oaks, maples and other common native varieties. (C)

- 165a Pavilion, Poindexter Park
  - One-story, one-bay, field stone and frame square pavilion with Craftsman influence, built ca. 1914-15. - 165b Trylon, Poindexter Park

  Three-sided pylon of cast concrete, built ca. 1940-45. A bronze plaque attached to the marker reads "to the Father, to the Son, to the Holy Ghost". There is evidence of another plaque, long-since lost. (C)

- 165c Site of Poindexter House, Poindexter Park

  The site of the Poindexter House is located immediately west of the park pavilion (172a), as evidenced by brick footings still visible in the soil and as confirmed by map sources. The full extent of the site is not known and was not tested during the preparation of this nomination; however, map sources note the location of outbuildings in this general area in 1875. (C)

204 General Streetscape Characteristics

Apart from its buildings, the Poindexter Park Historic District possesses characteristics of both public and private landscapes which contribute to its integrity of setting. The public characteristics of the streetscape are defined by the "broken grid" pattern formed by the street matrix. This matrix is embellished with elements such as mature street trees in the public right of way, early brick sidewalks laid in herringbone and basketweave patterns, and concrete pylon street markers. The private side of the setting includes lawn terraces (both with and without retaining walls), single— and double—track driveways, and concrete front walks. Landscape elements include mature lawn trees (varieties of oak, maple, magnolia, yellow poplar, red gum and sycamore, among others), ornamental trees and bushes (crepe myrtle, flowering locust, tea olive, etc.) and foundation plantings (boxwoods, azaleas, hollies, and flowering plants, among others).

NARRATIVE STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Poindexter Park Historic District is being nominated under three National Register criteria for its significance in areas of vernacular architecture, community planning and development, and archaeology.

Under criterion A in the area of community planning and development, the district possesses significance for Poindexter Park. the first city park developed after the original plan of alternating blocks and commons laid out in Jackson in 1822. The park was laid out in ca. 1902 on the grounds of the core of the former Poindexter "homestead" site, following the gift of the land to the City of Jackson from Mrs. Ellen Poindexter Moore. The development of the park was but one result of the late-nineteenth century progressive movement in Jackson, which also realized the annexation of Poindexter Park and West Jackson and the expansion of the city's school system to support the significant population growth of the period. Poindexter Park initiated the development of a park system for Jackson (followed by Livingston Park in 1916), and thus reflects the influence of the City Beautiful Movement in Jackson at the turn of the century.

Under criterion C in the area of vernacular architecture, the district possesses significance for its wide ranging collection of vernacular house types developed for families with economic means ranging from the working-class to the upper-middle class. The eastern streets of the district and those facing Poindexter Park feature vernacular building types familiar to the urban context, many of which possess some "high-style" elements of the Queen Anne, Colonial Revival and Craftsman influences. In contrast, though, are the more simple working class cottages found on the western side of the district, which appear as types more accustomed to rural settings that are afforded only modest detailing, if any at all. The great range of types to be found here stand in sharp contrast with the adjacent working class neighborhoods of West Jackson, which contain street upon street of shotguns and double shotguns with few variations. The variety of vernacular types represented in Poindexter Park provide the sense of a context by which the development of other low- and middle-class neighborhoods may be analyzed and compared. While there has been losses of some small groups of structures within the context of the entire neighborhood, and while alterations of some structures have resulted in the loss of architectural detail, the integrity of vernacular forms and types retains significance as a group.

Under criterion D in the area of archaeology (historic: non-aboriginal), the district possesses significance as the site of the Poindexter Estate complex on the grounds of Poindexter Park, known as "Oakwood". The origins of the large Greek Revival home that stood on this site are in dispute among local historians, who variously ascribe the construction of the house for former governor George Poindexter or his immediate family in ca.

1840-45, or, for state Supreme Court Justice W. L. Sharkey in the same period. The deed record is contradictory, which might indicate that the Sharkey and Poindexter families became related by marriage at this time. In spite of the conflicting information, the large dwelling and its various outbuildings revealed on a plat of the subdivision of the neighborhood in 1875 suggest the development of a large "suburban" estate complex, which was far more extensive than that shown in 1875. The site does offer the high potential for significant information to be contained in undisturbed subsurface features that remain on the site.

The Poindexter Park area began its development in the ca. 1840s, apparently as a result of the establishment of at least three large "suburban estates" -- one, the estate of William L. Sharkey, state Supreme Court Justice in the 1840s and 1850s; a second by Caswell R. Clifton, a major figure in the Whig Party who was an important figure in the state Whig and Democratic Convention of 1849; and the Poindexter family, which may or may not have included former governor George Poindexter (Daniel 1875; Hinds County Deed Book 9:434). The estates were developed on the high ground near the end of Capitol and Sharkey (now West Pearl) streets, straddling the city limits. The Clifton estate was located inside of the city limit roughly between the present-day alignment of Clifton and Minerva streets; the Sharkey estate was concentrated to the south of Sharkey Street; and the Poindexter estate occupied the rest of the general area extended from the city limit west to Rose Street, running from Sharkey Street to Robinson Road. The homes of these estates would have been visible from the core of Jackson, and particularly from State Street and the Old Capitol, since they occupied the next high ground at the horizon in the western vista of antebellum Jackson.

It is unfortunate that local research efforts have not provided a conclusive answer to the questions of ownership of the Poindexter estate property. Resolving these questions was beyond the scope of this project. Some sources cite that the property was owned by W. L. Sharkey from 1841 to 1864; there are also reports that the property was purchased by Mary Anne Poindexter in 1841 and held by the family continuously afterward (Coppenbarger 1950). There has been little research done on the children of George Poindexter, and thus, the relationship of Mary Anne Poindexter to the rest of the family is unclear. George Poindexter's second wife, Annie, died in 1834 and he did not remarry before his death in September of 1855 (Claiborne 1880:414). On the other hand, the deed records of the county do show that Poindexter's sons, Thomas and John J. (named for Poindexter's brothers) did own the property at one time (Hinds County Deed Book 29:761). Mary Anne, then, may have been George Poindexter's daughter, or the wife of one of his sons. However, since George Poindexter spent more than the last decade of his life living in Jackson, and since there are no other records which place his residence, the suggestion is made that he lived out his life in the company of his family on the West Jackson estate.

Following the Civil War, the large estates of West Jackson began to change. All three of the larger estates in the vicinity of the district were subdivided, in part or in whole, into five- to ten-acre plots and sold to a small number of willing buyers. By 1875, the basic street matrix in Poindexter Park was established largely as it exists today (Daniel 1975; Hinds County Deed Book 9:434), if only on paper. In ca. 1888, the death of Ellen L. Moore resulted in the gift of thirty-five acres of the Poindexter property to the City of Jackson for use as a public park (Jackson Commission Government Record, April 1, 1914(?):20-21), subject to the life estate of Preston Hay, her father, and Joseph Lester, her brother-in-law (op.cit.). The gift of property did not include approximately ten other acres within the entire ground of the property, which were dedicated in the will to other family members.

The disposition and treatment of the Poindexter estate property over the next twelve years is quite complex, and not fully understood. Indebtedness of the estate caused the city to sell off all of the given land, with the exception of ten acres now occupied by Poindexter Park and the Echols School. In effect, the city served in the role of subdivision developer during this process. The family members who retained the life estate contested the will, pleading that the city had no right to hold title to land outside of its corporate limits (then at Lemon Street). The Mississippi State Supreme Court ruled against the plaintiffs (Lester v. Jackson, 69th Mississippi, 887), and the life estate was purchased in 1901 to place the future park and school property in city hands (Jackson Commission Government Review, April 1, 1914(?):20-21). Development of the park began soon there after, and annexation of the park area and the subdivision surrounding it was achieved between 1904 and 1909.

The basic subdivision pattern and street pattern established in 1875 was followed by the city in its sale of portions of the estate lands in ca. 1894-95. Periodic re-subdivisions of individual blocks or parts of blocks occurred over the next thirty years. Principal among these were the Hawkins Subdivision, Day's Partition, the H. L. Hicks Subdivision, and the Shackelford Subdivision.

The population of the Poindexter Park area was sufficient enough to cause the construction of a school in the mid-1890s, even though the city had not yet annexed this portion of West Jackson. The city apparently felt confident enough towards the future annexation of the Poindexter Park area to float a bond issue for the development of Poindexter School, which opened on February 22. 1897. When opened, Poindexter School became the second public school in the Jackson city school system (Central High School being the other), again, even though the school was not then located within the City of Jackson (Jackson Commission Government Record, April 1, 1913:11-12).

NATIONAL REGISTER OF HISTORIC PLACES CONTINUATION SHEET

Poindexter Park Historic District
Section number 8 Page # 53 Jackson, Hinds County, Mississippi

Development of Poindexter Park by the City of Jackson began soon after acquiring clear title. There are only a few descriptions and early photographs of Poindexter Park as it was first developed. The scant information that is available documents that the Poindexter House was moved from the park site to a site on Robinson near its intersection with Rose Street in ca. 1900-02. The remaining buildings on the site were apparently demolished, and the park minimally developed as a passive park space. Playground equipment was added in 1912-13 (Jackson Commission Record July, 1913:15) The existing gazebo (the second on the site) was built in the ca. 1930s.

It does not appear that much additional grading or construction of "hard" improvements took place over the next forty years, given that the drives, footings and garden features of the old Poindexter House were still visible on site as late as 1950 (Coppenbarger 1950). Some of the existing trees in the park appear to remain from the original estate grounds, notably, the double-line of trees that lead due east from the gazebo to the intersection of Lemon and West Capitol streets.

The establishment of a street trolley line along West Pearl Street at the turn of the century provided a further enticement for the development of working-class and middle-class housing in the Poindexter Park. The first Sanborn fire insurance map of the area, issued in 1904, reveals that the eastern side of the district was largely built-out with middle- and upper-middle class housing. It is likely that the western portion of the neighborhood was largely developed by this time, though it was not mapped by the Sanborn Company until 1909.

The district's variety of working-class and middle-class vernacular architecture is quite remarkable, especially since the majority of it was apparently developed for rental purposes. Unlike many of the neighborhoods of Jackson which contain working-class housing, Poindexter Park is noticeably free of large groups of repeated or "pattern" housing for the working class, unlike all of the neighborhoods in the West Jackson area to its west and south. The suggestion is made by this evidence that the working class houses of the district were developed for dozens of different property owners, as opposed to mass development by one property owner as is strongly suggested in surrounding neighborhoods.

The neighborhood also possesses the unusual character of having numerous examples of the same building type developed for occupation by families of two different economic classes. By example, there are larger side L-plan types built for the middle and upper-middle class families of Minerva, Adams and Poindexter streets, as well as more modest side L-plan cottages built in the working class areas of the southern part of Poindexter Street and on Hunt Street. With the exception of the homestead, four-square and modified townhouse plans on the upper end of the economic class scale, and the shotgun, double-shotgun and modified shotgun on the lower end of the same scale, the vernacular architecture of the district possesses little other sense of exclusivity by class.

Poindexter Park Historic District

Given the diversity of vernacular house types in the district, particularly in the areas of working class housing, the question of motivation for the development of this housing becomes significant. Since the demand for middle- and upper-middle class housing was sufficient in West Jackson to have filled the eastern parts of the district prior to ca. 1904, as evidenced in Sanborn maps, why then was relatively valuable developable land in the immediately adjacent blocks given over for the development of rental housing for the working class? Unfortunately, the documentary record and the parameters of this project were too limited to provide the answer to this question, which does not appear to be clearly related to the racial origin of the working class occupants of the district.

A review of the earliest available city directories from 1904, 1910. 1916, 1922 and 1940 reveal consistent patterns of neighborhood occupancy at the beginning of the century which remained fairly unchanged until World War Two. Adams and Minerva streets were clearly the residences of middle- and upper-middle class Anglo-Americans, as were the portions of Poindexter, Lemon and Deer Park streets which faced Poindexter Park. Occupations of the heads of households at these addresses included doctors, lawyers, traveling salesmen, retail store owners, express company agents, and even upper-level partners in substantial Jackson businesses. In the areas of the district to the south and west of these enclaves lived working-class families, who were employed as domestics, porters, clerks, tradesmen. The modest residences facing Pearl, Hunt, Central and the western portion of Deer Park Street housed mixed populations of Anglo- and African-Americans, more or less living side-by-side. The southern part of Poindexter Street and the whole of Melba Street were largely populated by African-Americans (Southern Directory Co. 1904, 1910; Miller 1916; Tucker 1922; Jackson Directory Co. 1940).

Conflicting historical demographic characteristics of this district challenge some long-held perceptions of urban neighborhoods, especially in the segregated cities of the South. The conditions which are normally expected to separate groups of people and neighborhoods—conditions of economic class, race, and home ownership versus rental housing—all appear very blurred in Poindexter Park, but are very clearly defined in other places of similar age in Jackson.

It does appear that additional study is needed to resolve these perplexing conditions, which may provide the means for understanding the urban dynamics of other neighborhoods in Jackson with greater clarity— if not many other neighborhoods throughout the South. Certainly, additional historical research is warranted as a factor in resolving these uncertainties and quirks. However, in the case of Poindexter Park, the potential exists for the development of a late-nineteenth and early twentieth century model for interpreting urban cultures and subcultures, which may occur in a context of time that spans a full century. The development of these models must also include investigation of the urban archaeological record in an attempt to refine the larger, and particularly and more subtle issues which mark the qualities of this place. Given this, the entire neighborhood of Poindexter Park is appropriate to define the parameters for the archaeological study of this unusual urban model.

The archaeological context posed by this district raises questions that may be answered by further historical and archaeological investigation:

Poindexter Estate Complex

- * What was the original purpose and extent of the estate complex— was this simply a landed estate, or a larger, active plantation? What was the original organizational pattern of antebellum outbuildings, quarters, gardens, orchards and other features, in relationship with the original residence? How do the locations of these features relate to the current landscape pattern of the immediate estate site? If there was agricultural activity associated with the property, has the location of adjacent fields, laneways, and orchards affected the pattern of organization in evidence in the street grid of the district today?
- * What was the pattern of organization of labor on this estate? If slaves were kept on the property, is there a relationship of slave quarters and the division of labor within the system? If there is evidence of extended farming activity, is there evidence of separate areas for housing provided to domestic servants as opposed to field hands? If so, is there a pattern of hierarchy or privilege among the slave population? Do artifacts underscore this pattern?
- * What is the level of self-reliance of this place? How did that level change through time, especially in comparison of antebellum and post-bellum patterns? What trade patterns are indicated by ceramics and other cultural artifacts not produced on this place? What patterns of consumption and income-level is reflected by these artifacts? How does this pattern differ from families of the same income-level who lived closer to major commercial routes (e.g.: Mississippi River). What does this comparison tell us about the early development of Jackson as a city?
- * How did the pattern of labor organization change following Emancipation?

  How did this change affect the physical organization of the estate?

  Did this change affect the level of self-reliance on the estate? What different patterns of trade are reflected by the construction of railroad transportation arteries through Jackson in the late 1870s and 1880s?

There also appears to be the potential for archaeological resources of significance throughout the neighborhood which may provide important information on the lifeways of urban working class people (both African-American and Anglo-American) at the turn of the twentieth century. Of particular interest in the case of Poindexter Park is that the area appears to reflect the "break in the grid" phenomenon, which is reflected not only in its plan but in its socio-economic and ethnic character as revealed by city directory sources (Clay 1973; Weaver 1985; Weaver 1988; and, Weaver and Hopkins 1991). In this case, the "break in the grid" that occurs in the north-south blocks containing Poindexter Park and the Echols Junior High School serves as an area of transitional boundary between middle-class Anglo-Americans and predominately working-class African-Americans, though the boundary was by no means exclusive or impermeable. In this case, the neighborhood level appears to be the most appropriate scale of comparative analysis of significant information to be gained from consumer patterns and their ties to local, regional and national market networks.

There appears to be the potential for the development of an area of significance under an archaeological context that is worthy of further exploration. Unfortunately, the development of this context was beyond the scope of this project. None-the-less, great insight into several historical questions may be answered if research is explored. These include:

- * The transformation of the Poindexter Estate to a suburban neighborhood appears to have occurred in a relatively short span of time. Are there examples or sites of housing development remaining from its transitional period? How did the occupational activity change on these sites as properties evolved from non-urban to suburban, then urban use?
- * Whether Anglo- or African-American, working-class residents of the neighborhood would have had access to the same means of public transportation, local retail outlets and etc. Given this, what are the differences and similarities in patterns of consumption and of diet in evidence? How do these patterns compare with other known studies of urban models? What patterns exist linking these individuals and groups to local, regional and national marketing networks?
- * Does the complex relationship of economic class and races within this small urban context constitute an "epitome district", as posed by Clay (1973:38-42ff)? If so, are there recognizable patterns of economic, ethnic or racial congregation? Were there physical or psychological barriers that separated these congregations? Does the artifactual record provide evidence of behavioral or symbols which identified members of the congregation?

- * Given that the occupation of the district was closely divided (numerically) between owner-occupied households and renter-occupied households, what differences in artifact class assemblages and their frequencies can be discerned? Since artifact frequencies are often employed to identify the nature of the household from which the artifacts originated, how do these differ from expectations based upon comparison with interpretations of other urban or rural sites? Since occupational data for this neighborhood can be closely documented, what evidence does this artifactual record provide to support or alter previous conclusions?
- * What level of interdependency and interaction existed between the working-class residents and the middle- and upper-middle class residents of the area? Was this interdependency limited to social contact, or did it also include more direct patronage by employment? If so, is there artifactual evidence which may support this relationship?

In sum, the Poindexter Park Historic District is a unique and complex urban neighborhood that contains an important collection of vernacular architecture and possesses an unusual history of occupation. Its early history as the site of a significant upper-class estate provides the unique opportunity to study the antebellum lifeways and organizational patterns, which were forced to change in the wake of the Civil War. The transformation of this estate into a "suburban" neighborhood at the end of the nineteenth century resulted in an unusual pattern of occupation for Jackson, in which a wide variety of families from diverse economic classes, races, and backgrounds lived, in effect, side by side. The study of this phenomenon by a combination of documentation derived from the built environment, historical records and archaeological recovery may provide the lifeways of urban communities in Jackson as a whole, as well as to test general theories of urban cultural anthropology on a national basis.

10. GEOGRAPHIC DATA

Verbal Boundary Description

The property proposed for nomination is an irregularly-shaped area that is contained by the back property lines of properties facing Rose Street. Hunt Street, West Capitol Street, Clifton Street and West Pearl Street in Jackson, Hinds County, Mississippi, the boundaries of which are as delineated by a heavy black line on the enclosed City of Jackson planimetric map.

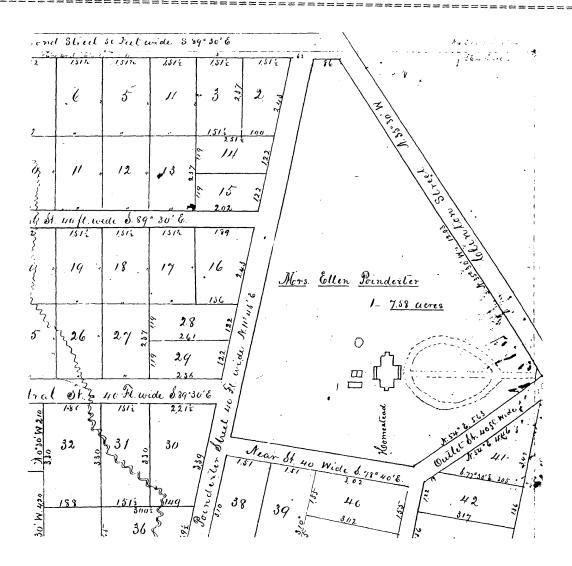

Boundary Justification

The property proposed for nomination comprises the largest portion of the Poindexter Estate site and the Poindexter Park Subdivision of 1875, and its context of boundary streetscapes, which retains its historical and architectural integrity during the periods of their significance.
