Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Romanzo Kingman House of Kingman, Maine, built between 1871 and 1872, is an extremely remote yet remarkably sophisticated example of the Italianate style in a residential context.

The house is of frame construction with hipped roof, central chimney, bracketed cornice, two stories, clapboard siding, and granite foundation. In general fenestration is 2/2.

The facade faces southwest and is three bays wide with an entrance to the left. This entrance is covered by a one-story portico with denticulated cornice, square columns and matching pilasters, and low balustraded railing. The doorway itself consists of double panelled doors with tall arched windows and an overlight.

The first story windows are crowned by consoled and pedimented lintels, while the second story windows feature consoled and entablatured lintels. In the first story of the southeast end of the house is a three-sided bay window with 1/1 fenestration. Both ends of the house are one bay wide.

Attached to the rear (northeast side) of the house is a two-story ell with detail equivalent to that of the house proper. A one-story porch covers the southeast side of the ell.

Attached to the ell is a two-story carriage house with gabled roof and cornice returns. This building lacks the detail of the house and ell.

The interior includes two handsome marble fireplaces and an unusual spiral staircase.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The visitor to Kingman today is at once struck by this sophisticated and well designed Italianate house in a village which appears to be in a state of decline. It is hard to imagine that here once stood a tannery which was referred to in 1892 as one of "two of the largest tanneries in the United States" both owned by Romanzo Kingman.

Kingman, together with William and Francis Shaw, founded the tannery in the late 1860's and together built the house which they shared, being bachelors at the time. Although the factory eventually became known as F. Shaw and Brothers, the town, then a plantation, adopted the name of Kingman reflecting his popularity. And the house has always been known as the Romanzo Kingman house.

Kingman moved west in the mid-1870's and founded another tannery in Wisconsin while retaining part ownership of the one in Maine. In the 1920's a disastrous fire destroyed the tannery in Kingman and many homes, a blow from which the town never recovered.

Now, with dwindling population, Kingman lies quietly in a remote rural backwater but still retains this one high style residence as a symbol of its former days of prosperity.
