Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The McDonald House is a two-story structure, constructed of brick and adobe manufactured on the property at a site just south of the house. The house originally consisted of eight rooms - a kitchen, dining room, living room, library, and four bedrooms. Although disguised by the projecting section on the right of the facade, the plan of the house is basically symmetrical. The only decorative details are the raised segmental arches over the front windows, which are continued on the sides in an austere imitation of stone drip moldings. A privy was located behind the house to the east. The brick is of a rich catmeal color.

The following changes have been made in the interior. Complete electrification, forced air heating, relocation of a stairway, certain interior walls removed to facilitate use as office space. A previously covered fireplace was returned to use, with new firebrick and damper added. Casings of fir, which had deteriorated beyond repair were replaced with casings of matching scale.

On the exterior a porch was added sometime between 1894 and 1912. Badly deteriorated by 1977, it was then partially rebuilt. An already existing enclosed back porch was reconstructed and finished with wood planking. An enclosed entrance to the basement on the north side was added to open up that space for commercial use. The hand-made adobe and surface brick were chemically cleaned in the fall of 1977 and the appearance of the house documents the advantages of this process over sandblasting. All exterior window frames were maintained intact, and repairs were made to soffit and fascia. The roof was covered in cedar shingles. A flat section of roof was replaced because of leakage with a low gable sometime after 1912. An iron fence, originally made for the Troy Laundry in Salt Lake City but part of the McDonald home since 1912, was carefully rebuilt, reinstalled, and painted. All doors are original to this structure. The house stands on an important suburban traffic route and demonstrates the beneficial effects of careful adaptive restoration.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The significance of the McDonald House lies in typifying the values of a middle-class newly emerged from the struggles to establish themselves in pioneer society. The simple dignity of the McDonald House suggests the residence of a hard working, upwardly mobile, skilled tradesman. The very plain house has few stylistically distinguishing details, and the central hall plan is a vestige of earlier venacular house types. Located away from the center of Salt Lake City, it documents the scattered pattern of settlement in the outlaying areas of the Salt Lake Valley. Although the Mormon Church dominated settlement patterns in Utah, the opening of a federal land office in 1869 brought the scattered homestead pattern to the state. The McDonald House exists today in the midst of later twentieth century development, an important remnant of early domestic architecture outside the immediate Salt Lake City area. The house has been carefully restored.

The architect-builders were the owners, David and Arabella McDonald, who lived in the building until their death in 1924. Both were immigrants to Utah in 1869, he from Scotland and she from Northern Ireland, and both were 41 when the home that was the measure of their success in America was constructed.

David McDonald had been educated in Scotland, and served five years of apprenticeship as a blacksmith and millwright. It was not until he was settled in Utah that he met his wife Arabella Anderson, whom he married in the Salt Lake Endowment House in 1874. David and Arabella remained supportive of the Mormon Church and its various programs, although his ambivalence about the Church was cause for comment. His membership in the largely Gentile Liberal party, and the broad and catholic selection of titles in his much-loved library suggest his distance from the mainstream of Mormon thought and practice. The McDonald blacksmithing business, located eventually only 50 feet from the McDonald home, prospered over the years. His increasing stature in the business community led to McDonald's increasing involvement in politics. With the introduction of national political parties into Utah, he quickly became established as an active Republican.

At the death of both parents in 1924, the home passed into the hands of other members of the family and eventually was converted into a rental property in 1966. The home is now the headquarters of a professional design firm.

Although a preliminary survey of Salt Lake County has not been completed, the Holladay area of Salt Lake County, shown on the attached USGS map, has been reviewed for the preparation of this nomination.

Only four other houses of the approximate period 1850-1900 remain in the Holladay area: the David Brinton house (National Register); the Templeman house at 45th South and Highland Drive; and two small houses on Wander Lane.
