DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Exterior dimensions of the depot are approximately 195 feet long (north/south parallel to the tracks) by 26 feet deep. Inside are eight large rooms (including separate black and white waiting rooms, baggage room, ticket room, and covered concourse) and seven smaller areas (storage, restrooms).

The structure is built in an eclectic style showing both Spanish and Italian influence in the details. The building is now vacant and steadily deteriorating. However, in 1977 the Enid Model Railroad and Historical Association signed a 15-year lease on the building. The group plans to renovate it for use as a railroad museum and site for a working model railroad layout.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Railroads have been important in the history of Enid from the day the city came into being - by run on September 16, 1893, when the Cherokee Outlet was opened to settlement - down to the present. Garfield County, of which Enid is the seat, lies at the heart of Oklahoma's richest agricultural area and the Enid 'skyline' - when seen from a distance - is a Chinese Wall of giant grain elevators. Railroads, to continue the figure, are the veins and arteries that keep the grain flowing in and out of these terminal warehouses. From the air they merge on Enid as spokes on the hub of a wheel. Three rail lines now serve the city.

The Rock Island was the first to arrive, even before the city was established. By 1869 it had built across the Outlet from Kansas to Old Oklahoma and it participated in the development of this central section of the ctite. The stage was thus set for the dramatic events that marked Enid's first year and the ley role the railroad was to play in them. Oklahoma: A Guide to the Sourcer State describes it like this:

Enid was chosen the site of a government land office in the Cherokee Cutlet well in advance of the opening. Government surveyors and troops moved in about a year before to run section lines and plat townsites. In opening day in 1893, however, it was discovered that certain enterprising and shrowdly profit-minded - Cherokee Indiana had chosen ellothents within the area planned for the town. When Secretary of the Interior Hoke Smith learned of the scheme, he ordered the townsite located three miles south of the original settlement around the railroad station. with the government land office, the county courthouse, and the post office separated from the depot, rivalry between the north and south sections promptly developed into a fend. Each claimed the name of Enid, and the other (depending upon which faction one belonged to) was tagged a suburb, North or South Enid. The Rock Island had refused to recognize the government ruling, continued to run its trains through South Enid without stopping. Then on July 13, 1894, a freight train went off the tracks into a ditch near South Enid, and investigation brought about the discovery that the bridge supports had been weakened by sawing. Rock Island officials announced that, while the company would respect any law the government might enact, it would not surrender to mob action. Secretary Smith's decision was upheld, however, by a presidential proclamation, and on September 16, 1894, a freight and ticket office was established in South Enid, which became the present city. A six-foot hatchet, symbol of strife, was later buried with due and proper ceremony by members of both factions.

North Enid (sometimes referred to as Northington) faded away. South Enid became Enid proper with a strategic location and immediate aire of permanency that was soon to make it the most important city of north-central Oklahoma. As the only trunk line railroad serving the city the Rock Island played a strong role in its growth. From Enid terminals it carries Oklahoma grain south by the train load to the Texas Gulf Coast at Galveston and the markets of the world.

Rock Island built a second depot on the site in 1903. When it proved inadepuate the present structure was erected in 1928. It remains today with only slight modification, a faded but still impressive symbol of the transportation industry that brought settlers into this rich agricultural area and has served its constantly changing needs now for almost a century.
