Carnifex Ferry Battlefield consists of more than 150 acres of farmland and wooded area north of the confluence of Meadow and Gauley rivers in Nicholas County, West Virginia. During the battle of September 1861, Confederate and Union forces were camped about the entirety of what is now the park, the former to the south and latter to the north of the grounds. Near the present entrance to the battlefield are evidences of trenches and the road leading to the ferry over which Confederate General John B. Floyd retreated. No less than 150 rifle pits are plainly visible to the left of the entrance in a wooded area.

One of the striking aspects of physical appearance is the abundance of native shrubbery, including rhododendron, little laurel, mountain laurel, service, wild plum, wild crabapple, holly, hemlock, white pine and various hardwoods. The view of the Gauley River from the site of General Floyd's commissary is of rugged cliffs creating a great gorge.

Since 1950 the open farmland has been developed for tourists. A house was erected for the park superintendent, and the old, battle-scarred Patterson house was restored for use as a museum of Civil War relics. This building stood between Union and Confederate lines and was struck by numerous stray shots; after the final engagement it was used as a Federal hospital. Little changed since the time of its Yankee occupation, the farm house is today a white, two-story building with thatched gabled roof, shiplap wooden siding, a porch with sloping thatched roof to the front and a lean-to addition to the rear.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

As a result of the Battle of Carnifex Ferry, the threat of Confederate General John B. Floyd to the Union positions in the Kanawha Valley was forever diminished. Of still greater importance was the fact that failure of his campaign at the Ferry freed a large part of the Valley to participate in West Virginia's statehood movement through a referendum, scheduled for October 24, 1861, on the question of the division of Virginia.

In August 1861, Confederate troops moved into the Valley; they were commanded by General John B. Floyd, the controversial Secretary of War in President Buchanan's Cabinet and former governor of Virginia. As soon as Union General George B. McClellan learned of Floyd's advance, he sent his subordinate, Brigadier General William S. Rosecrans, into the area to prevent Confederate domination. Rosecrans then established a defensive perimeter from Gauley Bridge to Cheat Mountain, placing the southernmost section under the command of Brigadier General J.D. Cox. Even though this and other precautions were taken, Southern forces succeeded in crossing the Gauley River barrier at Carnifex Ferry and defeating Union troops under Colonel E. B. Tyler at Cross Lanes (now Kesslers Cross Lanes) to the north. Then they fortified at Camp Gauley and awaited Northern retaliation.

Floyd did not have to wait long, for as soon as Rosecrans learned of the Confederate menace he departed from his headquarters at Clarksburg and headed for Carnifex Ferry, gathering about 7,000 troops on the way. When news came of this advancement, Floyd asked for reinforcements, but General Henry A. Wise, another ex-governor of Virginia, was jealous of Floyd's authority and used his own discretion in sending what proved to be too small a number to strengthen Floyd's troops sufficiently.

At Carnifex Ferry on September 10, 1861, Rosecrans ordered Brigadier General Henry W. Benham to reconnoiter the Confederate line. Floyd's troops engaged Benham's party in the afternoon and a battle ensued. By midnight Floyd realized his opponent's superior strength and withdrew his command from the Ferry. His escape was a remarkable feat considering the odds he faced at Camp Gauley and the narrow roads over which he was forced to retreat. This withdrawal, however, was a shattering blow to Confederates in the Valley and took pressure off residents participation in the coming referendum.
