Statement of Significance Wethersfield Historic District

on Wethersfield Cove, flowed the tradeof the upper Connecticut Valley to and from the Atlantic Coast cities and the West Indies. A unique and most important Wethersfield product was a flat red onion. This was marketed wherever Wethersfield ships sailed and was known as "Wethersfield Red". As many as a million and a half bunches were shipped in some years. The variety is still grown and seeds are sold throughout the world.

Wethersfield is one of the oldest areas of settlement in Connecticut. The first white men to acquire land there were a group of adventurers led by John Oldham from the Massachusetts Bay Colony. A number of people from Wethersfield have contributed to state and national history. These include Silas Deane who arranged for supplies for the Revolutionary Army in France and served in the Congress of the United States, Colonel John Chester whose carefully drilled regiment saved the battle of Bunker Hill, and the botanist Charles Wright, who was distinguished for his work in the southwest.

Wethersfield is noted for its military contributions to the colonies, and to the United States. During the Revolution a total of more than 550 men took up arms for at least part of the war. This was a remarkably large enlistment for a town of Wethersfield's population.

Wethersfield was one of the Connecticut towns joined together (Hartford and Windsor were the others) with the adoption of the "Fundamental Orders" in 1639. Some historians see this document as an important landmark in the evolution of democratic government --the first written constitution, the basis of the Constitution of Connecticut, and a model for the United States Constitution. Other important events in the town in the pre-revolutionary period were a voluntary tax collection to help Bostonians embargo English merchandise, the participation of the Company of Colonel John Chester in the "Lexington Alarm," and the confrontation and forced resignation of the Royal Stamp Master, Jared Ingersoll.

Landmark Joseph Webb's home in Wethersfield, now a National Historic Monument, wes the scene of the Yorktown Conference," a dramatic event coordinating the Continental Army, the French Troops, and the French Fleet, in a campaign culminating in the victory at Yorktown, the final battle of the Revolutionary War.

From the earliest days of settlement the men of the town have used the Connecticut River and the Atlantic Ocean for their livelihood. More than half the able-bodied men were ship owners or sailors at least part of the time. Many ships were built here to engage in trade with Atlantic Coast cities, the West Indies and European ports. Wethersfield was until 1700 the head of transportation on the Connecticut River. Through warehouses, such as the one remaining
