Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Watson House might best be described as being in the Free Classic style. It remains in its original condition except for a wrought iron front door, and modern roofing shingles on the house (although the front porch retains its original wood shingles).

Built in about 1900, the two story frame house is basically rectangular in shape, with the short end facing the street, and with its front corners beveled. The most prominent feature on the house is the front porch, which extends across the front (southeast) facade, stopping short of the beveled corners. Supported by slender columns, the porch features a pediment over the entrance, a spindled railing, and a fairly detailed frieze and cornice with dentils and Greek fret molding. Opening onto the porch are a door on the right and a window on the left. Directly above these two openings on the second story are two windows. All openings on the house have very simple moldings.

Above the second story is a frieze with dentils, and modillions supporting a cornice. This cornice surrounds the house except in the center front, where it is broken just below a dormer. This large dormer is centered on the front facade, and has small-paned casement windows, and a pedimented roof. The house roof is steeply pitched and hipped, pierced by two tall chimneys.

Each of the beveled corners is one bay in width. The one on the left has a single window on the first floor, surmounted by an apron of tiny fishscale shingles, which underscores a second story window. On the right side, the ground floor is cut away, but the apron and second story window are present.

On the northeast side of the house is a secondary entrance with a canopy. Occupying half of the rear portion of the house is a covered porch.

Inside the entrance is a spacious entry hall, with an oak stairway as its centerpiece. Doors and window frames are made of pine and are plain, in the sense that they are not carved or reeded. The first floor parlor and a bedroom on the second story have original fireplace mantels, that were purchased and installed by Marshall Field from Chicago when the home was built.

Since the house was built at a time when kitchens and bathrooms were inside the home, and it has had few owners, little has been changed.

There is one small outbuilding, the original function of which is unknown.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Combining elements of the Colonial Revival style with massing of the late Queen Anne style, the Watson House is the best example of this style in Charlestown. Contributing to its significance is the fact that it has undergone very little change since it was constructed at the turn of the century.

The house was constructed for Ward Watson, a teacher, lawyer, member of the State Senate (1895, 1897), and Judge of the Indiana Appellate Court (1907-1911). Watson was born in Corydon in 1857, and opened a law office in Charlestown in the 1880s. He married Edith Barnett in the early 1890s, and had this house built in about 1900. They lived there until her death in 1911, after which the house was locked up, remaining unoccupied until after his death in 1932.

Watson was active in Republican politics, and was one of a group of four men known as the Big Four, who wielded a powerful influence in the county. After retiring from the bench, he went into private practice in Indianapolis (Watson, Esarey & Watson). During this time, in 1917, Watson had another house built next door to this one, utilizing a ceramic tile in which he evidently had a financial interest.

Watson returned to Charlestown in about 1931, and died there in 1932. Between that time and the present, the house was owned by the Dysert family for about 20 years. The present owners purchased the house in 1956.
