Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Second Presbyterian Church is a good local example of the Romanesque Revival style applied to a church building of modest scale and materials. The church is of red brick on a rusticated stone foundation; the three rose windows on the west, south, and east facades contain wooden tracery and are faced with rusticated limestone, comprising the most notable architectural element of the exterior. There are twin corner tower entries on the south facade; the higher tower is the belfry and contains two tall round-head vents over a set of plain windows.

The interior is in the auditorium arrangement seen in many Victorian churches, although with a flat rather than a sloping floor. The plain plaster walls rise to a groin vault, and the windows are uniformly round-head. The floor is hardwood, and the stained glass is of 19th century design.

Historical Summary:

This is the third structure to house the Second Presbyterian congregation, which was founded in 1882 as a Southside mission of the downtown First Presbyterian Church. The building is the first on this site. It dates from 1901 and is believed to have been designed by local architect D. A. Helmich. Helmich is known to be the designer of the 1892 South Highland Presbyterian and the 1891 post office (now demolished), and features of both these buildings lend support to the contention that Helmich was responsible for Second Presbyterian as well. These features include use of rusticated ashlar in the Richardsonian Romanesque style, and other Romanesque suggestions in the massing of building and bell tower and in the use of round-head windows. South Highland Presbyterian, although definitely in the Victorian Gothic style, strongly resembles the later Second Presbyterian in terms of the satisfying proportions of its massing and the placement of the large stained glass windows.

Although allowed to suffer from neglect after the Second Presbyterian congregation moved to new quarters, the old church became part of the campus of the University of Alabama at Birmingham and has found new life first as the UAB Ballet House and now as the Honors House and home of several academic department offices.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Criterion C, Architecture

Second Presbyterian Church (1901) is a good example of turn-of-the-century Romanesque Revival architecture. Typical distinguishing features are monochromatic brickwork, round headed arched windows and doorway corner entry towers flanking the center, front facing, gable roofed, main block and corbeled brick blind arcaded cornices. The interior also exhibits Romanesque style elements such as three large rose windows in the west, south and east walls and a groin vaulted ceiling.
