45. Description and House Plan: (continued)

The log hall-parlor house originally had a conventional appearance with centered gable roof and projecting log plates. Beaded boards remain sheathing the projecting log on north front under porch. Original massive stone chimney with stepped shoulders at west end (now enclosed). Parlor separated from hall by a vertical beaded board partition, while similar wood sheathing covered interior of log walls. Ghost of a stair on east side of partition is visible in attic. "Transitional" mantel fed/Greek has pilasters, central tablet and end blocks, and molded shelf. Stair presumably relocated from conventional position beside pattition when frame addition to west was made, located eight feet foward of the axis of the original building. Stairs placed between addition and early section, in front (north) of chimney. Garrett shows evidence that roof framing was extended to encompass a new mid-19th-century porch under the roof. Garrett window openings flanking chimney remain on interior, as does beaded weatherboarding on former west gable. Front (north) of log section treated with a panelled wainscot and vertical sheathing, as well as a plaster porch ceiling. Added room served by brick chimney, has chairrail, 9/6 sash, pilastered mantel with heavy stepped moldings below shelf. Plain weatherb oards, box cornice on exterior. A frame ell to the south of the log section contains two rooms and a stone end chimney at the gable end with a brick upper stack. Pieces of beaded weatherboards 1 may indicate an early date, but may have been, more likely, reused from the early section. Plain weatherboard throughout, also stone foundation. Wood shingles exist under the current asphalt shingles. A late 19th century iron fence defines the domestic space, and extends the period of significance of the property.

The nominated area includes one contributing and two non-contributing buildings and one contributing structure (fence).
