Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Nicholas P. Clase House is a one-story with attic log and frame dwelling constructed in two parts. Both the broad three-bay log section and its later offset frame addition are sheathed in weatherboards. A rubble stone foundation supports the entire building.

The south facing front elevation features an engaged porch supported by three (originally five) round log posts. It shelters a symmetrical fenestration pattern that consists of a two-leaf door and flanking sidelights as well as wide two-over-two double-hung sash windows. These openings are framed by molded caps. A pair of brick flues rise through the roof ridge on either side of the broad central hall.

Four windows occupy the east end of the log block. These symmetrically placed units include, on the first story, unusual (for New Sweden) double one-over-one windows framed by a single surround and more typical two-overtwos in the attic. Three similar doubled windows are located along the north wall, and the east end pattern is repeated on the west wall except where the frame wing has disturbed the configuration.

The wing's date of construction is not positively known, although a documentary photo postcard of New Sweden postmarked in 1908 shows its existence at that time. It is narrower but of equal height to the log section and is attached to the latter's southwest corner. A door is located on the east end where it is covered by the porch and the south side features a pair of two-over-two windows and a hip roofed enclosed vestibule. There are two windows and a door in the west end and a trio of two-over-twos along the north side. A large frame barn was formerly attached to the southwest corner of this wing, an element that gave the connected complex a decided telescoping appearance.

The interior of the Clase House is arranged in a manner that is consistent with other Swedish log houses of the period. Entrance is made into a narrow vestibule which, in this case, has a corner stair to the loft. Flanking the vestibule to the west is the kitchen and to the east a pair of small bedrooms. Occupying the middle bay of the north side is the living room. With the exception of the northeast bedroom all first floor rooms in the log block are accessible from the vestibule. The summer kitchen consists of one large open room with a tool room and pantry at the west end.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Nicholas P. Clase House, which was probably built after 1874, is a little altered example of the modest log houses erected by the Swedish immigrants who settled in three Aroostook County townships beginning in 1870. These buildings represent a wholly unique tradition of construction in Maine. For these reasons the Clase House is eligible for nomination to the Register under criterion C.

Nicholas P. Clase (1821-1902) was among the first group of settlers who arrived in New Sweden on July 23, 1870. He and his fellow colonists were part of an experiment sponsored by the State Legislature to encourage foreign immigration to Maine following more than a decade of population decline resulting from out migration to the west. Each head of a Swedish household was given 100 acres of land, five of which were to have been cleared of trees, and a State built log house. Clase and his family settled in what became the village center of New Sweden on a lot which tradition maintains was the first one drawn by the colonists.

In its September 2, 1874, the Presque Isle newspaper Sunrise published an account of a visit to the Swedish colony. Included in this report was a detailed enumeration of the settlers, livestock, the dimensions of their buildings, number of children, and number of years in residence. Clase's entry shows that his farm included twenty-two acres of improved land. He also owned a number of animals. After his death the property descended to his daughter Agnes (Clase) Anderson and subsequently to her children. it was occupied until recently by her son Evald Anderson and has since passed to his niece.

At the time of the Sunrise article, Clase's house was recorded as being 28 feet by 18 feet in dimension, a very common size according to the list. This suggests that it was probably one of the original State built houses (which were said to be 28 feet by 16 feet). The existing house, which is 24 feet by 38 feet, is clearly a replacement of the earlier one, a fact that is evident from the method of log construction which is restricted to the Swedish built houses alone. Descriptions of those dwellings provided by the State reveal that they were built of an inferior method of round log construction similar to contemporary Maine logging camps. The Swedes, on the other hand, erected permanent houses which display well crafted log joinery, log interior partition walls and basements. In addition to the method of construction itself, the interior plans also reflect a much different approach to the arrangement of space. The Clase House, like a number of other examples, utilizes a narrow entrance hall with doors leading into flanking kitchen and bedroom spaces and a living room or parlor located between the two.

Like the previously listed "Timmerhuset" (N.R. 8/23/73) and the Larsson-Ostlund House in the Lars-Noak Historic District (listing pending), the Nicholas P. Clase House illustrates a truly unique tradition of building in Maine. While a number of these houses survive in the New Sweden area, few have retained the integrity of the Clase House.
