Section number 7 Page 1 Name of Property Ridge Avenue Historic District
County and State Bonneville County, Idaho

INTRODUCTION. Ridge Avenue is the focal point of a clearly defined residential area of Idaho Falls which developed soon after the turn of the century. This triangular residential area in which Ridge Avenue holds a central position is sharply delineated by the former Oregon Short Line Railroad on the west, South Boulevard on the east, and West 13th Street on the south. The City of Idaho Falls began as a crossroads west of the Oregon Short Line Railroad and adjacent to the Snake River. As southeastern Idaho developed into an irrigated agricultural region in late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the residential development of the city moved east of the railroad tracks. Ridge Avenue and the surrounding streets became the home of the community leaders of early Idaho Falls. Peak construction occurred from 1900 to 1911. Those who built homes on Ridge Avenue and the neighboring streets used a variety of styles and materials to visibly express themselves. Today that variety of styles and materials is unified by scale (generally one and one-half stories), density (most lots are 7,000 square feet in size), and mature deciduous trees.

The Ridge Avenue Historic District is being nominated under Criterion A, community development, and Criterion C, architecture. The district offered residents an opportunity to construct substantial homes reflecting their growing prosperity in a fledgling agricultural economy. Although intrusions have been encouraged by the local zoning pattern of forty years as well as the original mixed nature of the housing, the neighborhood continues to be a distinct neighborhood in which many significant and unaltered homes illustrate the changing residential tastes of its early occupants.

General Characteristics. The Ridge Avenue Historic District is defined by the mature tree canopy, the street pattern, the age of the buildings, and two major community structures. Originally an irrigation canal severed the area from its eastern neighbors as distinctly as the railroad on the west does. The canal has since been covered, but the newer north-south street pattern continues to isolate the area from the newer residential areas on the east. The height of the district's mature trees unify the area as does its street pattern which parallels the railroad.

Two early community buildings form a nucleus for the defined district. Those who first constructed homes in this area built near Central School, one of the earliest schools. Central School was built in 1882 on a site interior to this residential neighborhood. It is now the site of the former O. E. Bell Junior High School, a contributing building. In addition to the school, one formidable church, which is on the National Register, is adjacent to O. E. Bell. These two imposing buildings contribute to the sense of time and place of the Ridge Avenue Historic District.

The first homes in the Ridge Avenue Historic District were built in the 1890's, adjacent to the Central School site, and were constructed of native stone with basalt foundations. Later homes often retain the use of basalt for foundations. The area bordering South Boulevard is higher in elevation than Eastern Avenue and the railroad. Because many of the residential lots sit approximately three feet above the street, native stone retaining walls have been used; this feature contributes to a cohesive street appearance.

National Park Service

Density of development also creates a cohesive street appearance. Ridge, Water, and Placer avenues are a portion of the Original Townsite of Eagle Rock (the early name of Idaho Falls). The townsite was platted in 1884 in lots of 50' by 140'. Although many first owners bought one or more lots, the final development pattern has generally been 7,000 square foot lots. This common density is a unifying feature in the district's physical appearance.

Homes that contribute to the district possess good integrity and are examples of the styles that were popular in the region and the West in the early twentieth century: Late Queen Anne, Bungalow, Colonial Revival, and Prairie School. The homes were built in the period when stables and garages were located in the rear of the property and served by the alley. Detached accessory buildings remain a unifying feature among a variety of housing styles.

Isolated by the Union Pacific Railroad line (formerly the Oregon Short Line Railroad) and the east-west street pattern of neighboring neighborhoods, the Ridge Avenue neighborhood is demarcated by its tree-lined streets, the use of basalt and other native stones, the age of the buildings, and bulk and height of development.

Property List. The streets in the Ridge Avenue Historic District are Ridge Avenue and portions of Placer, Water, Eastern Cedar, Ash and Maple streets. Buildings are listed by the site numbers assigned on the attached map.

Dates of construction are based primarily on city directories and deed records. Unfortunately, there were no city directories published prior to 1907. Therefore, when possible, listings in city directories were verified against recorded deeds. For biographical information, the city directories of 1911-1912 or later were the principal source of information. Issues of the Post Register were consulted as well as the publication Beautiful Bonneville.

Properties labeled noncontributing include office buildings or multi-family residences which were built within the past fifty years and have such bulk and height that they do not replicate the density or size of the original structures.

Detached garages are typically gable-front and single bay. They are generally constructed with clapboard siding and corner boards. In at least three instances, the garages were former stables with a loft. Garages were rated as noncontributing if they were built after 1940 or do not retain integrity due to exterior materials or additions. Detached garages of sufficient age, integrity and compatible design are designated contributing.

The properties within the district are generally in sound structural condition. The only properties that are beginning to deteriorate are the Thomas and Mary Wilson boarding house (94), an imposing basalt structure, and O. E. Bell Junior High (19). The roof has been recently replaced on the boarding house, and the O. E. Bell is simply experiencing the effects of being empty for years. It is still structurally sound, and its owner is actively seeking to find investors. The George Apartments have also been neglected. Unsympathetic window replacement has characterized recent attempts at improving the apartments.

The Ridge Avenue Historic District symbolizes early Idaho Falls. From 1895 to 1920, Idaho Falls grew from a settlement on a transportation route to Idaho's third largest city. During this development, the Ridge Avenue area became the city's prominent residential neighborhood. Today it remains a clearly demarcated neighborhood that reflects the variety of residential styles favored by the city's early residents. The variety of styles not only reflects the taste of the owners but also trends that were found in southeastern Idaho and the state. With its distinctive, relatively unaltered appearance and its association with the city's first period of growth and prosperity, the Ridge Avenue Historic District is eligible for the National Register under Criterion A (community development) and Criterion C (architecture).

Idaho Falls began as Taylor's Crossing on the Snake River in 1864-1865 when Taylor constructed a bridge to serve miners and freighters moving supplies from Salt Lake City to gold fields in Montana and northern Idaho. Soon after the bridge was built, Robert Anderson and his brother, J. D., opened a store and a bank at the bridge crossing. In June, 1872, the citizens of the small community, believing that its name implied a "wide place in the road," changed its name to Eagle Rock. Beginning in 1873, the Utah Northern Railroad began to extend north from Brigham City, Utah, and reached Eagle Rock in March, 1879. In the summer of 1881, the Oregon Short Line Railroad began to serve Eagle Rock and, when negotiations failed in Pocatello, built its shops in Eagle Rock. Workcrews for the Oregon Short Line Railroad brought people and growth to Eagle Rock, and in 1882 the community boasted that it had 670 residents. Negotiations succeeded in 1884, and the shops were moved to Pocatello. With removal of the shops, the population quickly dwindled, and the future of Eagle Rock began to look bleak.

In site of a number of irrigation projects within the Snake River Valley, during this period the young community remained little more than a crossroads. With the arrival of the railroad, Mormon expansion north from Utah, and the efforts of Midwest developers, major canal systems began to transform the upper Snake River Valley after 1880. The Anderson Canal, which waters approximately 6,000 acres, was built during the years of 1879 and 1880 by the Anderson Brothers and others. In 1884, construction was begun by the Eagle Rock and Willow Creek Canal Company to supply water to the area lying east and northeast of Idaho Falls. In 1891, the Great Western Canal and Improvement Company was conceived by Bernard McCaffrey, a developer from the Midwest, to bring water to the west of Idaho Falls. By 1894 construction had begun on the Great Western and Porter Canal, and in 1900 the irrigation improvements of the Great Western Land and Irrigation Company were purchased by the New Sweden Irrigation District. In 1904, the Osgood Project was conceived by the Idaho Falls Dry Farm Association to supply water to about 7,000 acres northwest of Idaho Falls. These were just a few of the major canal projects to be developed in the arid region around Idaho Falls in the thirty-year period from 1880 to 1910.

The city itself developed a canal soon after the turn of the century to provide electric power to the city. A portion of this canal originally formed the east boundary of the Ridge Avenue residential area.

During this time of canal construction, the city again began to gain population. By 1900, the city had a population of 1,262. In 1910, the residents of the city numbered 4,827, and by 1920 the population nearly doubled with 8,064 residents. Before 1890, the residential area of the city was confined to the area adjacent to the Snake River, south of Eagle Rock Street and west of the railroad. By the turn of the century the commercial area had begun to move north to the present downtown area, and residences had moved east of the railroad. In 1895, the Idaho Register reported that Mr. Crow had established his lawn at the first home built on the east side of the railroad track two years earlier. With the start of the homes of A. D. Morrison and Marquis McKee, the Register reported that a building boom was beginning east of the railroad in late 1896.

The Ridge Avenue area was to become the home of many of the community's leading residents. A. D. Morrison was the general manager for the Great Western Canal and Land Improvement Company, which began to settle and develop the New Sweden area west of Idaho Falls. Bowen and Kate Curley built their Queen Anne/Shingle-style home, in 1899 on Ridge Avenue. Both were instrumental in bringing cultural facilities to the fledgling city and in beautifying the city being built in sagebrush. Many of the hardwood trees that line the streets of the Ridge Avenue area were planted by Bowen Curley. Adelia Scott was the first woman Justice of Peace in Idaho. She also served as county treasurer and served on the school board. Barzilla Clark, Mayor of Idaho Falls from 1927 to 1936 and Governor of the State of Idaho from 1937 to 1938, constructed a home on Ridge Avenue. In fact, many of the early mayors of the city were residents of the Ridge Avenue area; Bowen Curley, Alvin T. Shane, Edward P. Coltman, D. G. Platt, and Ralph A. Lewis. Merchants such as G. G. Wright who were instrumental in the growth of the city chose to build their homes in this area as well as attorneys of the area, such as O. E. McClutcheon from Saginaw, Michigan, who assisted the residents of New Sweden in the passage of new laws for irrigation districts. Minnie Gibson Hitt, who started working in the Anderson Bank in the 1890's, became the cashier and a member of the Board of Directors. Until she retired in the 1940's, Mrs. Hitt was a well-known and respected banker.

Although many living in the district were community leaders, not all of the homes within the district are large or impressive. Many are modest homes. This variety in size and value within a neighborhood is a pattern that remained in Idaho Falls residential neighborhoods until the 1960's. Some of the homes on the western edge of the district (North Eastern, North Water) were rentals which may have housed those working for the Oregon Short Line Railroad and those working in the developing downtown. Other modest homes simply belonged to businessmen, attorneys, or physicians who occupied smaller homes, most of them Queen Anne cottages. These modest homes, as well as larger homes which had boarders, were scattered throughout the district.

Within the district, the styles and materials of the homes are as varied as the first occupants, reflecting the popular styles and patterns found in Idaho early in the twentieth century. The first homes were built from local materials--stone and basalt--and are represented by the homes of VanBlaricom, Morrison, Changnon, McKee, Curley, and Hasbrouck. As Idaho Falls grew into the center of an irrigated agricultural economy, the use of native materials waned.

By the turn of the century, Idaho architects were using such new materials as pressed brick and poured concrete. Home owners in the Ridge Avenue area began to construct with brick; between 1900 and 1920, fifteen buildings were constructed with brick. One concrete-block residence was built soon after the turn of the century.

Not only does the district reflect the growing use of materials in Idaho but also it reflects the growing sense of styles in the state as well as locally. Idaho Falls developed too late to have any examples of the Italianate style. The Queen Anne style is prevalent in the district. As rendered in the Ridge Avenue area, it is typical of the examples found in southeastern Idaho:

In southeast Idaho the style's complex massing was rendered with a conservatism that deemphasized its variety and playfulness, and builders continued to use ornamentation with classical origins throughout the Queen Anne period (Attebery, 1991, p. 65).

Late Queen Anne with its classical detailing is the dominant form, and the homes of Wright (34) and Anderson (7) are excellent examples. The district reflects another characteristic of southeastern Idaho--the unpopularity of the Shingle style. Only the Curley home (5), one of the most impressive in the district, reflects the Shingle influence.

In Idaho, contractors never entirely discarded the taste for classicism. Colonial Revival designs began to appear at the turn of the century and became standard in the state's building boom from 1902-1910 (Attebery, 1991, p. 68). The home (74) constructed for A. D. Morrison, a native of Chicago, is a very good example of the early influence of Colonial Revival on vernacular architecture. The Hasbrouck home (66) represents the rendition of the style in native materials. The Rowles house (62), although built after the state boom, is one of the strongest examples in the district.

Although there are a few homes influenced by Tudor Revival designs within the district, Craftsman and Prairie styles provided greater guidance for most of the later owners and contractors in the district. The Frank Sheppard home (65) is one of the earliest examples of Craftsman and still retains a strong front facade. The district contains very good examples of the popularized Craftsman styles in the Wilbur residence (32), Kelly house (48), Coltman duplex (51), and Clark house (52). The duplex constructed for Murphy (97) is an excellent example of Craftsman.

In southeastern Idaho, Prairie style was favored by many who were influenced by Utah designs (Attebery, 1991, p. 87). Within the district, the George apartments (55), the Late Louis Hartert house (6), and the Late William Luxton house (36) are excellent examples of the buildings with a Prairie-style flavor.

The Ridge Avenue Historic District is significant for two reasons. The city went through its first major period of growth at the turn of the century. During this time the Ridge Avenue area developed. It is the only neighborhood which retains a substantial sense of its time and place in the city's history. Not only do residents still associate the homes in the district with the city's early founders but also the homes are a fine representation of the variety of acceptable residential styles found in southeastern Idaho in the early twentieth century.

BOUNDARY JUSTIFICATION

The boundaries that have been historically connected with this residential neighborhood are the Union Pacific Railroad (originally the Oregon Short Line), South Boulevard, and West 13th Street. Unfortunately, a large portion of this area has been converted to office buildings, apartments and multi-family units within the past thirty years. Such structures generally do not contribute to the district due to their style, bulk, height, and lot coverage. Therefore, the boundaries have been determined by the existence of the mature tree canopy, the retention of the original lot coverage and bulk of the residences, and the age and integrity of the structures. Ridge Avenue has historically been the focal point of the neighborhood and is therefore the central street within the district.

Of the 146 properties in the district, there are 93 structures that are contributing. These contributing buildings include homes, garages, one church, and a former junior high school. Most of the noncontributing properties have been altered by the application of metal siding, the enclosure of porches, window replacement, and the addition of rooms.
