Description:

The Lower 20th Street Residential Historic District is located in the east portion of the city along the Chattahoochee River. This is the only street in the district. The houses are all early 20th century Victorian cottages and shotguns. They are one story, single-family dwellings. Some of the houses have simple ornamentation, while others have elaborate porches and gables. Two houses at the top of the district built in 1890 have elaborate gingerbread, bargeboard, window and door surrounds.

Most of the houses are situated near the middle of their lots with informally landscaped lots. The district begins on a small hill near the Chattahoochee River and gently slopes down to 6th Avenue. Generally speaking, the largest homes are built on the top of this rise.

Significance:

Community Planning. The Lower Twentieth Street Residential Historic District is significant to the community planning of Phenix City as one of the first surveyed, subdivided tracts of land ^{outside the original 1830's town plan.} ~~in town.~~ This section of housing is representative of the subdivisions surveyed for William J. Ingersoll, who sold it in half-acre building lots beginning in 1875. Identified as "Ford's Survey of Ingersoll Lots" on original deeds, the development stretches beyond Summerville Road to the west, and eastward to the River. These lots filled the need for housing created by the expanding Columbus Mills. The lots were auctioned off in stages between 1875 and 1892. This Victorian development, with only a few sections still intact, provided enough housing to shift the population center of the multiple resource area significantly northward.

Architecture. The Twentieth Street Residential Historic District is significant architecturally as one of the most complete streetscapes in this early subdivision. Most of the houses on the west end of the street represent the late 1870's and 1880's. These houses have an ell shape, or rectangular floor plan, with Greek Revival porches. Some have ornamental gingerbread. The houses on the eastern end of the block were built after the sales in 1892, and represent late Victorian styles of cottages. Houses here have ornamental curves, and elaborate trim. Except for four shotgun houses in the district, associated with unskilled mill workers, the houses represent middle class housing of their period.

Local History. The Twentieth Street Residential Historic District is significant locally as representative of this area of town. Among the residents of the district in the early twentieth century were five textile workers, two bankers, two salesmen, and a foundry molder. The area is reported to have remained in good condition through the Great Depression. It began to decline when older residents died, and their children sold the property. The homes today are largely rental properties, but the extant streetscape serves as a reminder of the subdivision of property, and the early development of the Brownville subdivision.
