Fort Negley was the largest and most important fortification built by Federal troops after occupying Nashville in 1862. It occupied the center of the Federal defensive line which stretched in a wide circle around the Southern part of the city. Three other forts - Casino, Morton and Houston were also built. The fort was named after Union General James Negley, the Provost Marshall of Nashville. The engineer in charge of supervising the construction was James St. Clair Morton. The name was changed to Fort Harker following Negley's questionable leadership of his troops during Gen. Longstreet's breakthrough at the Battle of Chickamauga, but locally the fort has always been known as Fort Negley. The Federal Army was determined to hold Nashville at all costs because of its importance as the gateway to the South and because the South had counted on Middle Tennessee as one of two main areas for supply of provisions for the Confederate Army. Nashville was the most fortified city in America at that time.

The stronghold was completed in three months by conscript laborers from the city of Nashville, who were housed nearby and not allowed to go home until the job was completed. Although it was necessary for the fort to be constructed quickly, the work was well-planned and executed. The best European designs were followed and the fort was considered to be impregnable. The fort was thought to be of such significance as an example of military defense engineering that American Army officers during World War I were sent to study the ruins of the fortification.

The guns from Fort Negley opened the Battle of Nashville the morning of December 15, 1864. General George Thomas and the Federal troops occupying the city defeated a smaller Confederate Army under the command of Gen. John Bell Hood during the two day battle, ending any hopes of victory in the west that Confederates may have had.

After the war, the abandoned fort gained some additional renown when former Confederate Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest lead a contingent of KuKlux Klansmen in a march from their headquarters at the fort to the State Capitol in downtown Nashville.

Fort Negley remains as one of Nashville's most important landmarks, significant not only for its military role during the Civil War, but also as an important example of engineering utilized in military fort construction during that war.
