7. Description

The First Presbyterian Church is located near the downtown area of Cleveland (pop. 26,652) in Bradley County, Tennessee. Constructed in around 1856, the one story red brick church is rectangular in plan with an asphalt shingle gable roof. A focal point of the church is the square, frame belltower. The tower is surmounted by a belfry with windows and a copper steeple with finials. Large stained glass windows, a molded brick cornice and a distyle in antis portico comprise the major design elements on the exterior. The interior exhibits paneled and molded wood trim. Although stained glass windows were added in around 1919 and a brick addition was built on the west (rear) in 1935, the First Presbyterian Church retains much of its architectural integrity.

The east facade presents a temple form with a recessed portico or distyle in antis. Two square brick columns with capitals and four pilasters accentuate the symmetrically proportioned facade. The entry is flanked by tall stained glass windows surrounded with wood casings and capped by a contiguous lintel board. Iron tie rods with five-pointed stars are situated near the bottom of the windows and below the eaves. Two smaller stained glass windows with paneled aprons and wide lintel boards and two double leaf paneled doors capped by transom lights embellish the portico. The pedimented gable of the facade is distinguished by molded brick raking and horizontal cornices. This treatment is carried over onto the north and south elevations. Part of the rear (west) addition is visable from this view. A large stained glass sindow, a double leaf entry with a pedimented lintel, and one 1/1 double hung sash window comprise the design elements of the addition.

The north elevation displays five stained glass windows with wide lintel boards and wood casings. At the southwest section of this elevation is a one story shed roof porch that leads into the 1935 addition.

Four stained glass windows, similar to those on the facade and north elevation, characterize the design of the south elevation. A two story (plus basement) gable roof addition projects from the southwest corner. The addition displays two 1/1 double hung sash windows on each floor and two multi-pane windows at the basement level. A brick and concrete porch with a metal balustrade is located at the intersection of the old and new sections.

No original features of the First Presbyterian Church are extant on the west elevation. Only the 1935 addition is visable. Several windows of various sizes are located on this elevation.

The large rectangular stained glass windows compliment the finely crafted woodwork of the interior. A molded wood entablature, fluted pilasters, and paneled wainscoting, altar, and pews embellish the sanctuary of the church. Two paneled doors with architrave molding and scroll pediments flank the chancel area. Several ceiling medallions further enhance the interior of the church. Both the sanctuary and altar are part of the original plan, while the chancel is located in the 1935 addition.

The small flat lot on which the church is located is minimally landscaped. Situated on the southeast portion of the lot is the original 1859 church bell. Removed from the belfry in 1979, it is still used.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The First Presbyterian Church in Cleveland, Bradley County, Tennessee is being nominated under National Register criterian C for its local architectural significance. Begun in 1856 by local contractors, John and James Cowan, the one story brick church is an interesting interpretation of ecclesiastical Greek Revival architecture. Its well-executed design is evident in the temple type facade and a distyle in antis portico that displays brick columns and pilasters. A pedimented gable with molded cornice trim and a frame belfry enhance the appearance of the church. The interior is characterized by molded and paneled woodwork. The First Presbyterian Church was altered in 1919 and 1935, but still retains much of its architectural integrity.

In 1837 the first two churches in Cleveland were established. Both the Methodists and Presbyterians organized congregations in the town of 400 people and held their first services in the courthouse. On November 11, 1837, the Reverend Ralph E. Tedford and the Reverend L. R. Morrison founded the First Presbyterian Church. Cleveland was beginning to develop as a trading center and in January of 1838 it was named the seat of Bradley County. That same month, the town commissioners were authorized to reserve from public sale lots on which churches could be built. The First Presbyterian Church received lot 86 and proceeded to erect a frame building.

The congregation worshipped in the frame church until around 1856 when it was decided to build a new church. A covenant drawn by church members stated that the congregation should "erect a Presbyterian Church Building more in accordance with the other improvements of the town and in keeping with its progress in population and prosperity than the one now in use." It was signed on February 3, 1855 by various church members who also pledged to help pay for the new building.

On March 3, 1856, a contract was executed between a three man building committee and John and James Cowan. The contract required that all work on the new church be completed within one year. Specifications called for a one story structure with a 60' by 40' plan. Foundations were to be three bricks thick while the church, itself, would be constructed of red brick (two bricks thick) and timber girders. An "ornamental cornice" and a wood shingle roof were required for the new church. Columns around a 8' by 24' recessed entry were to be constructed of fluted stone while two front entries would be 5' by 12', including transom windows. Both the facade and the five bay side elevations were to have triple hung sash windows with 36 lights. Although there were plans for a finished interior and a belfry, these were not required to be built in this contract. Only part of the interior would be completed, including two doors at a rear gallery. The contractors were paid $3,000.00.

The new First Presbyterian Church was dedicated on October 22, 1858 by the Reverend James N. Bradshaw. An early photograph shows brick columns although most other building specifications were carried out as in the contract. The multipane windows were removed in 1919 and stained glass windows were installed in their place. The original west (rear) is now obscured by a 1935 addition.

The First Presbyterian Church is in excellent condition and continues to be used for religious services. Two other churches in Cleveland have already been listed on the National Register. The 1873 Victorian Gothic St. Luke's Episcopal Church (NR 1982) and the 1893 Victorian Romanesque Broad Street United Methodist Church (NR 1984) represent different eras and designs. These two churches and the First Presbyterian Church provide a good representation of ecclesiastical architecture in Cleveland.
