Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Elias Abel house is a popular but simple version of the Greek Revival style of pre-Civil War days. On the west side of the main structure (in the back) are what appear to be two additions. One of these additions is on the southwest side and is of a salt box style. The other is on the northwest side and has a pent roof.

The frame structure is two stories high and at present is covered with asbestos shingles. These have come off in several places and what was once white clapboard siding can be seen underneath. The main facade is along the east side. At the present time, there is a one story verandah across three-fourths of the main facade. Originally, however, there was only a portico at the main entrance. There are now four columns along this front porch, only one of which may be original.

The roof is made of a composition material and is of medium pitch. The chimneys in the main facade are offset; the one in the salt box addition is extended to rise above the roof line and is located mid-center. All chimneys are of brick.

The roof trim of the main facade has plain projecting eaves, and a plain boxed cornice. The frieze is decorated with lovely dentil molding. All are made of wood. It has plain boxed cornices on the gable ends with a plain return. Again, the dentil molding is carried out along the raking trim and return frieze.

On each corner of the house, the original pilasters are still exposed. The windows are flat with plain molding, plain surrounds, and plain sills, all of wood. Each has doublehung sash with six over six lights, both upstairs and down, though windows upstairs are shorter than those downstairs.

The front door is located in the center of the main facade's five bays. It, like the windows, has a flat heading with plain molding, plain lintel, and plain surrounds, all of wood with no reveal. The door is flush with lights on either side. The transom panel is blind, but originally, it probably was either one or multi-lighted. What appears to be original glass is still in some of these panes.

Other interesting features include the front walk of large handcut limestone, the unusual downspouts, and the lovely old Chinese elm that stands to the left (south) of this house.

Inside, the south half of the house has transoms over each doorway separating the rooms. The transoms are unusual in that they have three lights each, and open horizontally. Other items of interest include the mantel, which may be original, and stairs made of hand-planed * boards. The rail, balusters, and newell post seem to be original and may be of cherry. In the attic at the front of the house is a hand hewn walnut log, said to have been a customary addition to bring the owner good luck.

In the basement is a fruit cellar with a full ceiling. The floors are made of hand-made brick. There are limestone walls, and the floor joists were cut by a water driven sawmill.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

and the second sec

The Elias Abel House is architecturally significant as perhaps the finest example of a Greek Revival, central hall plan house in Bloomington. It is also significant because it was built by one of the city's early prominent citizens.

Elias Abel was born in Whythe County, Virginia, in 1800, and moved to Monroe County, Indiana, in 1824. He worked as a day-laborer until he married, when he became a farmer. In 1841 he moved to Bloomington and became the County Treasurer, an office he held for 13 years, then becoming Deputy Treasurer until 1856. He served as a town councilman in 1848, and was elected to the Indiana General Assembly in 1856. Abel served again as County Treasurer from 1858 through 1862, when he retired from active business life.

Abel purchased the property on which the house stands in 1845 for $250. He sold it in 1856 for $1,000, which reasonably establishes that the home, or at least a portion of it, was constructed during this time.

The house is what is sometimes referred to as an "I" house, a two-story house with a central hall flanked by a room on each side. The Indiana Historic Sites and Structures Inventory of Monroe County referred to the Abel House as perhaps the best frame example of the "I" house in Bloomington. The Elias Abel House has been designated as historic by the Bloomington Plan Commission.
