The Kirklin Public Library is a one-story Classical Revival brick building with a low-pitched, hipped tile roof, built on a simple rectangular plan. It stands on a small, level corner lot facing northwest onto Main Street (the old Michigan Road). The town grid is oriented along this road, which runs at an angle through the town. The grassy lot is unshaded except for two small birch trees planted in the center of each side of the front lawn.

The building rests on a foundation made of the same brown brick as the rest of the building. A brick water table separates the first floor from the raised basement. Brick quoins decorate the corners of the building, and ornamental rows of soldiers and headers run along the top and bottom of the walls.

The main facade is symmetrical with five bays. Four pairs of full-height one-over-one sash windows with six-light transoms flank a central doorway. All of the windows have simple white-painted architrave trim with brick sills. Twelve concrete steps between brick knee walls with concrete copings lead to the doorway. A sidewalk with railings made of metal pipe runs from the bottom of the stairs to the street.

The double metal and glass doors (replacing the original wooden doors) are framed by a classical door surround consisting of brick pilasters topped by a full entablature and triangular pediment decorated with modillions. Above the door is a transom formed of eighteen panes, six across by three high. The frieze above the transom contains the words "PVBLIC LIBRARY" in black, Roman-style letters. A rust-colored metal awning covers the entryway and obscures the transom. Flag holders are set into the brick pilasters on either side of the door. The hipped roof has a simple molded cornice and is covered in flat tiles painted grey.

The southwest elevation contains two pairs of six-over-one sash windows placed high on the wall so as to allow room for bookshelves beneath them on the interior.

The southeast (rear) elevation has six one-over-one sash windows set high on the wall, and five similar windows below the water table at basement level. The windows at the right end are of different sizes than the rest. At the far right stands a small brick exterior chimney.

The northwest elevation has two pairs of full-height one-over-one sash windows with six-light transoms, echoing the windows on the main facade. At sill height, an enclosed brick entryway contains a door that leads to the stairway. Originally, there were double doors in this opening; now there is a single door and a book depository. To the left of the entryway is a shorter brick structure that forms the top of the coal cellar. To the right of the entryway is a brick knee wall with a concrete coping. A short sidewalk leads to the side street.

The interior of the building is divided into a reading room, librarian's office, and a restroom. A stairwell centered on the northeast wall divides the latter two rooms from the main reading room. The stairway leads to the side door, then reverses at a wide landing to give access to the basement/children's reading room.

The main reading room has a high ceiling covered with acoustic tile and containing fluorescent lighting. The original pressed tin ceiling remains in place behind the modern tiles. The circulation desk occupies a central position in line with the main entrance. The desk, reading tables and chairs, and bookshelves were purchased at the time of construction with funds from the Carnegie grant.

The inner doors that lead to the vestibule are double doors of walnut with glazing in upper and lower panels. The glass is removable, leaving wire screens in place for summer ventilation. Above these doors is another 18-light transom identical to the one above the outer doors. The original dome-shaped frosted glass light fixture hangs on replacement chains from the ceiling of the vestibule.

The basement contains one large room and two storage areas that are on either side of the stairwell. The walls of the large children's reading room are covered in panelling and the ceiling is acoustic tile. Originally, the basement was used for storage and was left unfinished.

The exterior of the building retains a high degree of integrity; only the doors have been replaced. The interior has its original woodwork and many original fixtures, but the floors and ceilings have been modernized.

Section 8-Statement of Significance

The Kirklin Public Library is a fine example of an early 20th century small town facility that still serves the public. The library is eligible for the National Register under Criteria A and C. Under Criterion A, the building represents the culmination of a movement to create a free public library in Kirklin. It has served as the only public library for the community since construction was completed in 1915. Architecturally, the Kirklin Public Library is a good example of 1900s Classical Revival, the only one in the community. It is also one example of the work of architects Brookie & McGinnis, who were responsible for nine other Carnegie libraries in Indiana.

Entrepreneur and philanthropist Andrew Carnegie was born in Dunfermling, Scotland, in 1835. Having earned $333 million in the steel industry, Carnegie was determined to benefit others with his wealth. He established a program to fund the construction of libraries throughout the English-speaking nations in 1886. Carnegie believed his libraries should be free, public institutions for communities that expressed an interest by offering a building site and public funds to maintain the property. Indiana received more Carnegie libraries than any other state, a total of 164. Many are still in use as libraries while others have been adaptively reused. Except for buildings already promised but not completed due to the cost of building materials during World War I, no Carnegie libraries were funded after 1917.

Earlier buildings donated by Carnegie tended to be imposing monuments; however, by 1908, he recognized this problem and requested that plans of proposed libraries be submitted for approval. This process was formalized in 1911 when James Bertram, Carnegie's personal assistant, issued a set of suggestions titled, "Notes on Library Buildings" (sic). Carnegie believed that libraries should be plain and dignified, and this idea is reflected in Bertram's leaflet. "Notes" outlined basic requirements and included some suggested floor plans.

The Kirklin Public Library conforms closely with plans suggested in "Notes." The simple rectangular massing and Classical Revival detailing also clearly reflect Carnegie's wish that grant recipients not build "Greek temples" as libraries; rather, simple yet dignified structures were appropriate.

As an example of Classical Revival design, the library is unique in Kirklin. The Post Office and bank are both new structures, while most of the commercial buildings on Main Street are Italianate. The school was demolished in 1959. One church in town is built of the same dark-brown brick and exhibits the same rectangular massing as the library, but the Classical Revival details are absent from the church.

Historically, the Kirklin Public Library was the culmination of the free library drive started in 1913 by the Double Six Club, a women's social organization that wished to undertake a project that would benefit the community, especially its children. The club mentioned the need for a library, but did not think it possible because of the amount of money necessary to establish and maintain it.

When the club found that Carnegie money was available for library construction, one of its members donated a building site. Another woman donated additional land for the site. In February 1914, a representative from the Indiana Library Commission spoke to townspeople about how to levy a tax for library use and about choosing a library board. Five board members were immediately elected, and soon secured a one-mill tax levy (one cent per every thousand dollars of assessed property value).

With the necessary maintenance funds voted for the library, the Board readily secured a $7,500 grant from the Carnegie Foundation in May 1914. The grant did not cover the town's street assessment, but another meeting raised over $1,000 from twenty citizens for this purpose.

During the time the plans were being made for the library building, the "library" was housed in a vacant room over one of the local stores. The space was donated by one of the Double Six Club members, and books were provided by a "book shower" which resulted in over three hundred volumes. Volunteers operated this library for two afternoons a week for the eighteen months before the new library building was completed.

In June 1914, the Library Board asked for bids from three architectural firms: Brookie & McGinnis and Johnson & Shriver of Indianapolis, and Austin Bond of Carmel. Brookie & McGinnis won the contract, making the Kirklin library one of ten Carnegie libraries that the firm had built. The building was completed in June 1915, and dedicated in December of that year. The oak circulation desk, oak reading tables and chairs, and swinging walnut screen/glass doors that were purchased in May 1915 are still in use today.

When the library was constructed, it served a total of 400 patrons with 650 books. Today, it serves 1200 patrons and has nearly 17,000 books. The library still provides home delivery of books to patrons who are unable to get to the building. The Kirklin Public Library remains a very important part of the community.
