Section 7 Page 5 Orangeburg City Cemetery name of property Orangeburg County, South Carolina county and State

The Orangeburg City Cemetery, established in 1889, is a late-nineteenth to mid-twentieth century black cemetery in Orangeburg, South Carolina. The cemetery, located on the corner of Bull and Windsor Streets in Orangeburg, is a five-acre tract with a main drive bisecting it, and contains approximately three hundred to three hundred-fifty plots. Grave markers are primarily granite or marble tablets, obelisks, and table-top stones. Most burials date from ca. 1890 to the 1960s. Several stones are broken or toppled and several graves are sunken or mounded. Burials still take place here, but do so infrequently due to the presence of two modern perpetual care cemeteries in Orangeburg.

The cemetery is laid out in a regular grid plan, with little discernible landscaping or other planned features other than a few deciduous or evergreen trees shading particular family plots. Though the cemetery had fallen into disrepair by the late 1980s and was plagued by overgrown vegetation, vandalism, and litter, descendants of original members of the Orangeburg Cemetery Association and local civic groups began working to maintain the cemetery and went to the City of Orangeburg for assistance. City officials agreed to take title to the property since the charter of the Orangeburg Cemetery Association has lapsed, and the city now owns and has responsibility for maintaining the cemetery.

The Orangeburg City Cemetery, established in 1889 as the first non-church cemetery established for blacks in the city, is significant for its association with many leaders of Orangeburg's--and South Carolina's--black professional class, including several prominent educators associated with the twentieth-century growth and development of South Carolina State College, a leader in black higher education in the state since its establishment in 1896. Other merchants, bankers, lawyers, doctors, and educators, forming a who's-who of Orangeburg's sizable and influential black community, are also buried here. The cemetery is also a significant example of a late nineteenth century and early twentieth century vernacular cemetery illustrating common black burial customs during this period.

The Orangeburg Cemetery Association, founded April 5, 1889, was incorporated by a group of black civic leaders in Orangeburg. Among the significant persons buried in the cemetery are:

Johnson Chesnut Whittaker (1858-1931), a prominent educator best known today for an incident that occurred in 1880 while he was a cadet at the United States Military Academy at West Point. Whittaker, who was born a slave in Camden, was one of several blacks who attended the University of South Carolina during Reconstruction; he was appointed to the Academy in He was court-martialed after he was attacked in the middle of the 1876. night by masked white cadets who slashed and beat him, then tied him to his bed and left him bleeding there. The authorities, after the court-martial, concluded that since no white cadet admitted to attacking Whittaker, then the young South Carolinian must have faked the attack to draw attention to himself. He was discharged from the Academy. "I only wish a chance in the race of life," he wrote when he left West Point, "and I think I can make my mark and win a place." Whittaker returned to South Carolina, where he attended the University of South Carolina, received a law degree, and practiced law in Sumter before teaching chemistry, mathematics, psychology, and military science at South Carolina State College. He moved to Oklahoma, where he became a high school principal, then returned to Orangeburg as principal of the high school division at South Carolina State; he died in Orangeburg in 1931. Only three of twenty-three black cadets who attended West Point in the 1870s and 1880s--including Johnson Whittaker--graduated and received their commissions in the United States Army. Whittaker received a posthumous commission as a second lieutenant in the United States Army in 1994.¹

Robert Shaw Wilkinson (1865-1932), a prominent educator who served as the second president of South Carolina State College (1911-1932), succeeding Thomas E. Miller. Wilkinson was a native of Charleston who, like Johnson Whittaker, attended the United States Military Academy at West Point but did not graduate. He graduated from Oberlin College in 1891, then taught at Kentucky State College until 1896, when he came to Orangeburg as one of the first faculty members of the new Colored Normal, Industrial, Agricultural and Mechanical College of South Carolina (later South Carolina State College). Wilkinson taught physics and mathematics before becoming president of the college in 1911 when Thomas E. Miller resigned in protest over the election of the outspoken demagoque Coleman E. Blease as governor. Wilkinson, who led South Carolina State through a period of transition and growth in which the campus and the curriculum were both transformed, commented in 1931 that it was necessary "to provide for maintaining the present program and allowing for future expansion. What investment can promise more for the future of the Negro and of South Carolina?" He also served as president of the Negro Land Grant College Association and the Palmetto State Teachers' Association.²

Marion Birnie Wilkinson (1870-1956), the wife of Robert Shaw Wilkinson, Mrs. Wilkinson was herself a prominent educator and social activist. A native of Charleston, Marion Birnie was a graduate of the Avery Normal Institute and taught there as well before she married Wilkinson in 1897. Mrs. Wilkinson was quite involved in campus activities while her husband was president and for many years afterward, and was instrumental in founding a chapter of the Young Women's Christian Association on the campus and in overseeing the construction of the Marion Birnie Wilkinson YWCA Hut, known as the "Y Hut," in 1925. She was also quite active in the large Orangeburg community as well, founding the Sunlight Club; was one of the founders of the South Carolina Federation of Negro Women and was an officer in the National Association of Federated Negro Women; and founded the Wilkinson Home, a home for black girls.³

Miller Fulton Whittaker (1893-1949), the son of Johnson C. Whittaker, Miller Whittaker was himself a prominent educator who served as the third president of South Carolina State College (1932-1949), succeeding Robert Shaw Wilkinson. Whittaker, who had been at the college since 1913, had been professor and dean of the Division of Mechanical Arts and was an architect who designed several buildings on the college campus including Bradham Hall (1916), Manning Hall, (1916), Lowman Hall (1917), Hodge Hall (1928), and the Home Management House (1928); his design for Hodge Hall was his master's thesis in architecture from Kansas State University. The younger Whittaker served as the president of South Carolina State during a period in which he oversaw the dramatic growth and development of the college physical plant and its educational programs as well. "I have an ideal for the College," he told the graduating class of 1937. "It is this: That each student shall give evidence of high moral character and personal worth, seriour intellectual effort, and an understanding of his obligations to society. . . . I would not have you become snobbish, but I would have you exhibit to the world by your manner of behavior and speech--there goes a State College man or State College woman." He also served as President of the Conference of Land-Grant Colleges and of the State Association of College Presidents, Deans, and Registrars.⁴

The Orangeburg City Cemetery is eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion A for its association with the ethnic heritage of black South Carolinians and for its association with the role of South Carolina State College in black education throughout the s twentieth century. It is also eligible for listing under Criteria Consideration D because it derives its significance from graves of persons of transcendant importance in the community.
