The Benjamin H. Carter House (1911-1912) in Quitman is a distinctive interpretation of the Colonial Revival style. It is located on an expansive lot on the northwest corner of Depot and Ferrill Streets. Though the house faces Depot Street to the south, its address is listed as 210 Ferrill Street.

The Benjamin H. Carter House is essentially a symmetrical square box with an integral wraparound porch on three elevations. The porch features attenuated Tuscan columns and a balustrade. The one-and-one-half story, 3 by 5 bay house is of frame construction with a weatherboard wall treatment and rests on brick piers with brick infill between them. Its complex roof is punctuated by large gables on the front and side elevations and an interior corbelled brick chimney. The majority of windows have a 1/1 double hung sash configuration.

In the porch area, on the front facade, is a central, single-leaf door capped by a transom and flanked by 1/1 double hung sash windows. Above, on the main roof, is a gable featuring returns, a triangular attic vent and a paired window. In the porch area on the west (side) elevation, the porch is partially enclosed but an original 1/1 double hung sash window has been retained. A gable with the same treatment as the front gable punctuates the roof on this elevation. A carport extends off the rear of the west elevation. The porch area on the east elevation contains two windows and a single-leaf entrance into the house. A gable similar in design to the other two dominates the roof. Towards the rear of this elevation are two paired windows and a single-leaf door.

Originally, the rear elevation had a small rear wing with porches on its east and west elevations. These rear porches were enclosed in 1961. The small enclosure on the west elevation of the wraparound porch was constructed a year or two later. Despite these alterations, the house retains its original Classic Box form. The building sets far back on a large corner lot that is landscaped with trees and shrubbery. The Benjamin H. Carter House is a prominent landmark in the neighborhood(Carmen Culpepper Hammack interview, 6 June 1993).

The Benjamin H. Carter House is located in a quiet residential neighborhood in Quitman. Judging from the extant resources, residential development occurred in this area from the mid-nineteenth century up to the mid-twentieth century. All of the houses and yards appear to be well-maintained. However, commercial development is creeping eastward from the intersection of Archusa Avenue and Depot Street.

The Benjamin H. Carter House, constructed in 1911-1912, is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places under Criterion C. Though not a high style interpretation, it is one of the very few examples of the Colonial Revival style of architecture found in Clarke County and retains a high degree of architectural integrity. The house is a distinctive local articulation of a nationally important style of architecture. The Ben Carter House is the county's best articulation of the Colonial Revival style discovered to date.

The Colonial Revival style in America was popular for residential architecture from 1880 to 1955. However, the style really caught on in the 1890s. The Chicago World's Fair of 1893 introduced colonial inspired architecture to the nation. This architecture was a reaction to the excesses of Victorian design and fulfilled Americans' desire for a style of architecture that symbolized their patriotism and hearkened back to their past (McAlester 1984:321 & Flaherty, Jan. 1978:1,8).

The Benjamin H. Carter House illustrates how a nationally popular architectural style was adapted to the culture and environment of Clarke County. The people of Clarke County were experiencing major changes in their society due to industrialization and the influx of northern and midwestern lumbermen to the region. They were also aware of national trends in design. Classical styles of architecture such as the Colonial Revival appealed to Clarke Countians' patriotism and recalled for them a history that seemed much simpler than their present-day lives. However, as the Benjamin H. Carter House shows, Clarke Countians also adapted the latest trends in architecture to their environmental conditions.

The Benjamin H. Carter House features common Colonial Revival design elements. The house is designed as a symmetrical square with classical design motifs. The main door's central location on the front facade accentuates its prominence in the overall design. Paired windows are also found on the house. The dominant architectural feature of the house, however, is its one story wraparound porch. This porch is a direct response to Clarke County's climate. Generally, if a Colonial Revival house has a porch it is a simple, one story gallery spanning the front facade. The divergence in the style's design on the Benjamin H. Carter House is due to the hot, humid Mississippi summers. A wraparound porch shaded the house from the sun thereby cooling it and increasing the benefits of cross ventilation. This type of porch also provided more outdoor living space than a full-width porch (McAlester 1984:320-341 passim).

Though a modest interpretation of the Colonial Revival style, the Benjamin H. Carter House is a significant example of how environment and culture can impact an articulation of a national architectural style. The house is one of the best examples of the style in the county and retains a high degree of architectural integrity.

This Colonial Revival house is attributed to George Carlson, a builder from Quitman. He constructed the house in 1911-1912 for Benjamin Harvey Carter (1878-1961). About this time, Carter was retiring as sheriff of Clarke County and going into the mercantile business in Quitman with his cousin Jeff Carter. He sold his share of the business in 1918 and became the vice-president and cashier for the Bank of Quitman. He was elected president in 1931 and held that position until his death in 1961 (Carmen Culpepper Hammack interview, 6 June 1993 and C. C. Hammack letter to SME, 8 June 1993).
