DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Ruth Suckow House is a small (25' x 28') frame cottage, built early in the 20th century. The plan is l-shaped, one wing for a living room and bedroom, the other for kitchen and laundry room. The gable roof is shingled, and the exterior walls are rolled asphalt siding over the original clapboards. Windows are plain sash, with 6/6 lights (now boarded over). There are entrances into the living-room and kitchen. Interior walls are plaster, covered with paper. Floors are wood, and there is wainscoting in the kitchen. There are two brick chimneys, one on each section of the L.

The house sits on a small rise of ground on a semi-wooded lot, with an excellent view of hills and valleys to the south. It has been neglected for several years, due to lack of financial means for its preservation. In spring, 1977, the Earlville-Ruth Suckow Memorial Association tentatively agreed to allow the local fire department to burn the house. This action was taken reluctantly, and members of the Association notified the Iowa SHPO of their intent. National Register status is sought both by the SHPO and the Memorial Association, in the hope that such recognition will generate more local support toward the preservation of the house, which might be translated into matching funds for a federal grant-in-aid.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Suckow cottage at Earlville is the most significant structure in Iowa associated with the productive life of Iowa author Ruth Suckow (1892-1960). As the daughter of a Methodist minister, Suckow from childhood led a peripatetic existence which continued throughout her life. Of the many places Suckow lived, however, the cottage at Earlville appears to have been particularly important to her. Although she stayed here only two summers (1925 and 1926), those periods were significant for her literary career: while here, she wrote her second novel (Odyssey of a Nice Girl, 1925), and a number of short stories. Suckow's fondness for the cottage she described in her notebook:

My House

The brown clock ticks on its shelf in the little cream-colored dining room with wooden walls and ceiling. I keep pinks or roses in a glass finger bowl on the little...table. I love my two pink chairs.

The bedroom is always bare, clean, and cool, darkened a little. The twigs of the cherry tree brush one window.

From the west door there is a view, beyond the narrow road that goes past the Dickson's, of a rise of green meadow with small old-fashioned houses set upon it, and some wild crabs near the road. In the late afternoon, after a shower, a lovely green light falls through the door...There is an open, clean, garnished look about the room, but very friendly...¹

Although Ruth Suckow featured a variety of characters and locations in her fiction, she is best known for her vivid portrayals of Iowa farm and small-town life. In all of her writings she drew heavily upon her Iowa experiences, and many of her settings and characters are readily identifiable as real places and people. 1924-1934 were her most productive years, during which she published 8 novels and many short stories. The latter, which appeared in several magazines, particularly American Mercury and The Midland, are considered her best work. Unlike her contemporary, Hamlin Garland, she did not use her fiction as a vehicle for introspection — rather, she thought of her stories as a "running commentary on life", bits and pieces of time and place.²

Ruth Suckow's perception of her work falls well within the mainstream of "regionalism", a concept of visual and literary art which flourished, particularly in the midwest, during the 1920's and 1930's. Regionalism's most emphatic supporter was artist Grant Wood, but the idea also found expression in the work of Marvin Cone and Thomas Hart Benton, as well as in writers such as Suckow, Garland, and Herbert Quick. According to Wood:

Regionalism seeks to direct preponderating attention to the natural landscape, human geography, and cultural life of particular areas of the country, in the belief that writers who draw their materials from their own experience and the life they know best are more likely to attain universal value² than those who do not....It has been a revolt against cultural nationalism -- that is, the tendency of artists to ignore or deny the fact that there are important differences, psychologically and otherwise, between the various regions of America.³

Ruth Suckow's intimate portraits of Iowa people and places do full justice to this statement. And although overshadowed in the popular view by better-known authors such as Hamlin Garland, Suckow "came nearer than any other writer has done to representing the whole of American life on farms and in small towns".⁴
