into the s	ea at Casco Bav.

Within the complex of buildings at the site are the light tower, keepers' quarters, whistle house, paint locker and garage. The tower is constructed of random stone rubble from the base to a stone ledge. There is a brick course from the ledge to the metal light housing. The tower room and whistle house are also constructed of stone and brick. The keepers' quarters is a wood frame building finished in clapboards and shingles. All of the buildings set upon stone and brick masonry foundations.

The keepers' quarters is a two-and-a-half story duplex with a combination of gable and hip roof construction. There is a living room, dining room and kitchen on each side of the first floor. There are three bedrooms and both on each side of the second floor.

Portland Headlight is one of the four lighthouses in existance whose construction was authorized by President Washington, and that has never been rebuilt. The main section of the tower remains today in the same form as when it was completed in 1790. It was first lighted on January 10, 1791. The tower was constructed of rubblestone taken from nearby fields and the shore. The builders were John Michols and Jonathan Bryant, two local masons. Bryant also had his own lime kiln where he burned limestone from the quarries in Rockland.

The original structure was 72' high with a 15' lantern. In 1813, twenty feet was removed from the tower and in 1883 another 21 feet was removed. Due to public reaction, it was raised again with brickwork in 1885. In 1900, it was repaired using the original stones from the section that had been removed in 1813.

The first keepers' quarters was built in 1816 and was a 34' X 20', one story cottage. The present keepers' quarters was built in 1891 upon the foundation of the old cottage.

Portland Headlight has been and remains as an important part of the Maine scene and as an important part of her history. She has stood for nearly two centuries as a beacon for the commerce of the United States (See Continuation Sheet)
