NARRATIVE DESCRIPTION

Located on Monticello Street, on the western edge of the rural town of Bogue Chitto, Lincoln County, Mississippi, the Foxx-Cox House is the grandest house still remaining from Bogue Chitto's time of prosperity during the late 1800s and early 1900s.

The town of Bogue Chitto is situated just east of the Bogue Chitto River and consists of a grid of approximately ten blocks. The Foxx-Cox House is located on the northwestern corner of the roughly gridded street pattern within what were the town's limits before it lost its incorporation in the 1920s. Today, Bogue Chitto is a true example of a rural town, with large yards used for grazing livestock, chickens, and other farm animals. In its heyday, however, the town was probably a bustling hamlet in the midst of the great pine forest that stretched across much of Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi. The terrain of this area is generally flat or gently rolling.

The Foxx-Cox House is a one-story, frame house with hipped roof and three cross gables, built in the Queen Anne style. The original structure was roughly rectangular with two chamfered bay windows breaking the plane of the wall on the front (north) and side (east) facades. A porch and room addition, which maintained the style of the original building, were constructed in the rear during the 1930s, creating an L-shape. In turn, the rear porch was partially enclosed during the 1980s renovation to office space. None of these changes affected the main facades of the building.

The foundation of the house is continuous brick with vents, although originally it probably featured brick piers and has recently been infilled. The original portion of the house is sided in 1×6 " drop siding, while the 1930s addition has thinner 1×4 " drop siding. There are also three interior chimneys that are symmetrically located along the building's axis. The c1895 chimneys are marked with decorative corbelling while the 1930s chimney is characterized by its chimney cap. The house is distinguished by three cross gables that are closed with a tin pent roof and feature identical octagonal and square imbricated shingling with a central jigsawn vent. The two gables with chamfered bays also feature decorative gable scrollwork under the frieze. All eaves are boxed and the cornice and friezes are plain.

The north facade is dominated by two gables that off-set its hipped roof. The five-bay facade is asymmetrical and reads window, door, window, window, window. All windows are four-over-four double-hung sash with wooden frames. A wraparound porch on the north and east elevations dominates the facade. The porch is constructed with beadboard and has vaulted beadboard ceilings and two exterior entrances. The importance of spindlework to a Queen Anne house is easily demonstrated in the elaborate details of the Foxx-Cox House. The gables feature intricate ornaments including square imbricated shingles and elaborately decorated wooden vents. The wraparound porch features delicate porch supports, lace-like brackets, a plain frieze and cornice, and eight-inch baseboards. The decorative details are continued on the main entrance with its one-light-and-three-panel door surrounded with two-light sidelights and four-light transom. The door surrounds have carvings that match the interior corner block paterae.

The west elevation has seven bays of four-over-four double-hung sash windows with the southernmost window decorated with squared, stained-glass panes. This elevation clearly shows the sympathetic 1930s ell addition. The ell is slightly recessed from the original structure in order to not distract from the house's overall appearance.

The south elevation is composed of a single three-over-one double-hung sash window. This elevation is the rear of the 1930s addition.

The secondary facade, or east elevation, is characterized with six-bays and the recessed 1930s addition. The original section of the house features four-over-four double-hung sash windows with wooden surrounds. A side, all-panel door is located on the wraparound porch and has a simple wooden surround. A cross gable dominates the c1895 structure. This gable is similar to those on the north facade with its decorative spindlework, square imbricated shingles, elaborate wooden vents, and lace-like corner brackets. The 1930s ell is very sympathetic to the main structure in its design, dimensions, and materials. The ell received further alterations in the 1980s when a section of the rear porch was filled in to provide office space. The enclosing of the porch was done with glass windows in order to retain the visual appearance of an open porch.

The interior of the house has been renovated for use as office space. However, none of these changes have directly affected the house's original floor plan. The house retains its central hall with two rooms on either side. As with most turn-of-the-century homes, the front two rooms possess a higher degree of architectural detail since they functioned as the social rooms while the back two rooms and hallway have less ornamentation. As for the ell and rear porch, they are still utilitarian in nature.

The Foxx-Cox House retains a high degree of its interior architectural details including an elaborate hall screen and original mantelpieces featuring decorative cable molding and brackets. The floors throughout the house are 1"x 3" or 4" sawn-lumber pine. The interior door and window surrounds are decorated with corner block paterae. All interior doorways are four or five-panel doors with single-light transoms. All four of the original c1895 rooms have wide, uncarved baseboards, and carved reverse ogee molding. The walls and ceilings throughout the house are exposed beadboard except for the rear room on the east side. Currently called the conference room, this room has plastered walls, corner Gothic millwork and a picture rail.

Overall, the Foxx-Cox House is an excellent example of a rural Queen Anne house. Even though the house has undergone alterations and its function has changed, its location, materials, feel, and dimensions have remained intact thus qualifying it for National Register listing.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Foxx-Cox House is significant under Criterion C for Architecture as an outstanding and intact local example of the Queen Anne style. The house, a one-story Queen Anne cottage, is the most ornate residence in the small rural town of Bogue Chitto. Several of Bogue Chitto's other houses dating from the same time period display the characteristics of the Folk Victorian style and are much less detailed than the Foxx-Cox House, which retains most of its identifying exterior and interior features, including imbricated shingling, cut-away bay windows, intricate spindle and scrollwork, fine beadboard, original mantelpieces, and an elaborate hall screen.

Because the Lincoln County Courthouse has been destroyed by fire on two occasions, the history of the Foxx-Cox House is rather murky. A construction date of circa 1890 or 1895 seems likely, based on the known growth spurt in Bogue Chitto with the establishment of two lumber mills nearby.¹ A late 19th century date is also suggested by the pitch of the roof, which is not at steep as the typical 1880s Queen Annes, but is not as shallow as the early 1900s examples.² The loss of courthouse documents has hampered efforts to date the construction of the Foxx-Cox House and to identify any other aspects of its history. Tradition states, however, that the original owner was an Illinois Central trainmaster named Foxx, and that the property was owned by the Coxx family at some later date, possibly around the time of the 1930s rear addition.

The Queen Anne style was popular in Mississippi from around 1885 until about 1905 when the Colonial Revival and Neoclassical styles began to appear more frequently in the state. In Mississippi, the style was most often found in detached residences, with very few institutional or commercial examples. Queen Anne residences were usually popular with members of the new merchant class which rose to a leadership role in the New South during the late nineteenth century and which congregated in the growing railroad towns and cities of Mississippi.³

In Mississippi, the most common sub-types of the Queen Anne style were the Spindlework and the Free Classical modes. The Foxx-Cox House is an excellent example of the Spindlework design, with its turned porch supports, spindlework in the porch frieze area and under the cut-away bay window, and intricate gable ornamentation. As such, the house compares favorably to the Galloway-Williams House, a Spindlework Queen Anne cottage in Jackson, Hinds County (listed NR 10/10/85).

Although minor alterations have occurred, including a historic rear addition, the Foxx-Cox House retains most of its identifying exterior and interior features--delicate turned porch supports, intricate spindlework, imbricated shingles, original carved mantelpieces and hall screen, beadboard ceilings and walls, and door and window surrounds with corner block paterae. Thus, the Foxx-Cox House is locally significant under Criterion C as an intact example of a Spindlework Queen Anne cottage.
