Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Magee-Sturtevant House in Kushla was built as an H-shaped structure, but with full-length front and rear porches, the building has the appearance of being rectangular in massing. The house is raised on brick piers and capped by a side gabled roof. Two gabled dormers are present on both the front and rear, and exterior end chimneys extend above the roofline.

The central door is flanked by 6/6 windows to either side which abut projecting side rooms. These rooms each have doors accessing the central entrance alcove as well as windows to the front and side. The main door leads to a central hall. On the left (west) is the parlor with double pocket doors and a simple Greek Revival mantel.

To the right (east) of the hall is another large room with a simple mantel. This room has doors into the front east room, the hall and the rear east room. The rear east room opens into the stair hall centered on the rear of the house, which in turn, leads into a room to the west on the rear as well as into the main central hall. The winding double flight stairs are very steep and lead to a secondstory central hall flanked by a room to either side. The flooring in the upper story is laid in random width pine boards.

Evidence (exterior siding in the hall and patched siding to the outside) suggests the rear arrangement was similar to the front and that the stair hall was originally open and recessed between two rear rooms. A single room addition with an exterior end chimney has been attached to the left side at the rear. It is reached by way of the west (left) rear room; the addition was one large room which a letter from 1878 suggests may have been added by the original builder of the house to serve as a school room for his children. The second-story hall has been partially enclosed for a pass-through bath.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Criterion A: Military History

The Magee-Sturtevant house achieved national significance as the meeting place where the groundwork was laid for the surrender of Confederate forces of the Department of Alabama, Mississippi and East Louisiana which, in effect, brought the War Between the States to an official close. It was here that Generals Taylor (C. S. A.) and Canby (U. S. A.) met on April 29, 1865 at which time a two-day truce was arranged. During the truce, news was received of the surrender by Johnston of his army and the repudiation of the Johnston-Sherman convention by the Federal Government. Canby then contacted Taylor requesting a meeting to discuss surrender terms. On May 4, 1865 the two men met in Citronelle, Mobile County, where General Taylor surrendered his army.

Criterion C: Architecture

The Magee-Sturtevant house, built 1846-1847, is architecturally significant due to its unique blending of a plan indigenous to the South Atlantic coast with the local Gulf Coast Cottage. The South Atlantic plan consists of a central hall with a room to either side and rooms to the front creating a recessed entrance with inset porch, and, in this case and not atypical of the Atlantic coast plan, a recessed rear porch between rear cabinets. The Magee-Sturtevant house is the only known example of this type in Mobile County. The structure also incorporates the full-length front and rear galleries with simple Greek Revival details found in the Gulf Coast Cottage. The origin of the two styles in one structure may be explained by the facts that Jacob Magee, the builder, was from Alabama and that his wife Mary was from North Carolina.

Integrity:

The Magee-Sturtevant house remains essentially as originally The most distinctive feature, the deep front porch with recessed constructed. entranceway, remains. The rear recess has been infilled, but in such a manner as to leave the original integrity and design clearly visible; it therefore has little The addition to the west side was, according to a letter from 1878, probably effect. built by Magee as his children's schoolroom, and is an early and essential part of the building's growth. The original kitchen/dining room to the east of the rear porch fell into ruin and was taken down in the 1930s. Evidence (exposed beams, patched siding, walls abuting windows and the locations of foundation piers) suggests that the recessed porches may have been larger and the protruding rooms would consequently have been smaller. However, the flooring and the staircase do not indicate any major changes. Therefore, a logical assumption is that the original design was altered during the construction phase. To conclude, despite the minor modifications made over time, the plan and fabric of the Magee-Sturtevant house remain intact and the building retains its essential integrity.

Historic Summary:

Jacob Magee, a lifelong resident of Mobile County, was a leader in local political events from 1838 to 1867, twice serving in the General Assembly. He held several positions in the City (deputy sheriff and clerk at Union Press among them) before moving to the country (1847) where he presumably farmed. He is credited with the founding of the community of Whistler where he donated 80 acres to the Mobile and Ohio Railroad for their shops, which served as the focal point of the area.

The Magee Homestead briefly entered the national spotlight toward the end of the Civil War. In his memoirs, General Richard Taylor, C. S. A., described the last few days of his part in the War. The same scene at the Magee Farm in present day Kushla was also described by Max Heyman in his biography of General Canby, U. S. A. At noon on April 29, 1865, Canby and Taylor met at Magee's farm north of Mobile. Reflecting the fortunes of the two, Canby arrived with a brigade of men, a military band and a number of officers while Taylor arrived by rail on a handcar propelled by two Negroes and escorted by one officer. A table was spread outside with a "bountiful luncheon" and champagne flowed. Canby and Taylor met inside and arranged for a two-day truce. During the truce, news arrived of the surrender of Johnston and the repudiation of the Johnston-Sherman convention by the Federal Government. On May 4, 1865, General Taylor surrendered the last organized Confederate force to Canby in Citronelle, thereby effectively bringing to a close the Civil War.

Upon Magee's death, the estate was cared for by a courtappointed administrator who sold the house and lands at auction in 1886 to Winnifred W. Peckham, a daughter of Jacob and Mary Magee. She maintained it for a short time, until 1887, when she sold it to John Bowen. The estate of Bowen sold it to Maria B. Armistead in 1893, who then conveyed it to Alfred Sturtevant in 1898. It remains in the Sturtevant family and the house is currently occupied by Margaret Sturtevant, the daughter-in-law of Alfred.
