DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Oatlands house is a large five-part Federal mansion with stuccoed brick walls. The center section of the house is three stories in height covered by a low hipped roof which is hidden by a parapet. The roof of the house was designed to be topped by an octagonal cupola, but it is uncertain whether it was ever built. The center section is fronted by a tetrastyle Roman Corinthian portico which was added in 1827 according to George Carter's instructions. Flanking the center section are two-bay two-story wings crowned by parapets. Beyond each of these wings is an octagonal-ended two-story projection which in each case contains a staircase. With the exception of the addition of a one-story porch on the octagonal-ended drawing room, the house has changed very little since the addition of the portico.

In addition to the large entrance hall, the house contains five principal rooms on the first floor with numerous bedrooms on the upper two floors. A simplicity of layout is revealed in the plan designed by George Carter and retained by the Eustis family, the last private owners. The entrance door has a definite Adamesque character both in the leaded tracery at the side windows and the overdoor lunette, and in the entablature frieze below the cornice. The cornice and frieze in the octagonal drawing room also reflect the sophisticated taste of the Adam period, although the cornice moldings and ceiling details of the other rooms are of a simple, solid character reflecting the Greek Revival style.

The house is situated on a broad terrace which has a commanding view of the surrounding farm lands and the Blue Ridge Mountains beyond. To the east of the house are the extensive formal gardens laid out circa 1803 by George Carter and enlarged and restored by the Eustis family. The gardens are particularly noted for their fine boxwood. The northwestern corner of the gardens is bordered by the formally designed outbuildings and quarters. Near the southeastern corner of the gardens are the numerous farm buildings, some of which date to the early-nineteenth century. Surrounding the complex of buildings and gardens is a large informal park and the farmlands beyond.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

Oatlands house was built between 1800 and 1803 by George Carter, son of Robert "Councillor" Carter of Nomini Hall, and great-grandson of Robert "King" Carter of Corotoman. The land on which the house was built was part of a 63,093 acre tract which Councillor Carter had purchased in 1776 from the estate of Lord Fairfax, proprietor of the Northern Neck. Councillor Carter gave 5,000 acres of this tract, which came to be known as Oatlands, to George Carter as his coming-of-age gift in 1798.

The design of the house is credited to George Carter himself, who derived his ideas from examples in William Chambers' A Treatise on Civil Architecture published in London in 1768. Not only did Carter design the house and supervise its construction, but he also laid out the extensive formal gardens and planned the architecturally interesting slave quarters and outbuildings.

Oatlands went into a gradual decline in the years following the War between the States so that by 1897 the Carter family sold the estate to Stilson Hutchins of Washington, D. C., founder of the Washington Post. In 1903 the estate was acquired by William Corcoran Eustis, grandson of William Wilson Corcoran, philanthropist and donor of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and by his wife Edith, daughter of Levi Parsons Morton, Vice-President of the United States under Benjamin Harrison. The house and part of its farm were given in 1965 to the National Trust for Historic Preservation which currently exhibits the house and sponsors equestrian events on the grounds.

As architecture, Oatlands house with its extensive gardens and numerous outbuildings ranks as one of the most elaborate Federal country seats in America. The complex is also valuable as a social document exhibiting the elegance of Virginia country life in both the early-nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries.

Statement of Significance

Oatlands, near Leesburg, Virginia, was built between 1800 and 1803 by George Carter and completed on 1827 with the addition by him of the roof parapets and the monumental Corinthian portico. This very formal brick house covered with stucco, is a fine part composition composed of a three-story central section flanked by two-story wings and terminated by semi-octagonal bays which contain the stairs.

George Carter is believed to have designed Oatlands himself with the help of an 18th century English style book by William Chambers. Whatever the source, the finished house is one of the finest extant examples of the late Federal style and a highly original composition combining, as it does, the use of octagonal forms and solid parapets which create the impression of flat roofs.
