Columbia, Marion County, Mississippi

Narrative Description

The Broad Street – Church Street Historic District is composed of 370 buildings and one site, which lie roughly east of High School Street, west of Pine Avenue along Church Street, west of Sumrall Avenue along Broad Street, north of Broad Street, and south of Church Street in Columbia, Marion County, Mississippi. The district includes mostly residential structures with a few scattered religious buildings, two historic schools, a few historic commercial buildings, a waterworks building, a city park, and some newer commercial development along Broad Street. The character of the district is that of a residential area that grew out from the commercial downtown area as the population of Columbia grew from the increasing prominence of the lumber industry, manufacturing, and the rail line. The district area includes an interesting mix of houses of different sizes, styles, and prominence.

In Columbia there was only one logical direction of growth for the city as the population increased. The Pearl River and the railroad had a large part to play in the early development and the lumber mill and industry in the later development. The Pearl River is located just west of the downtown commercial area and was once used for transportation of goods to Columbia. Once the railroad came in 1899 the river was no longer the primary transportation route. The railroad tracks were built parallel to Main Street and curved around the courthouse square with a small spur just south of Broad Street. The railroad enabled the timber industry to grow in the early twentieth century and lumber mills sprang up along the railroad tracks. Thus the only logical pattern of residential growth for Columbia was east of Main Street and the commercial core of Columbia. A majority of the streets existing today east of Main Street show up on the 1915 Sanborn map of Columbia however it seems that the southern portion of these streets developed first as the Sanborn coverage of residential buildings starts there and expands east and north with later maps.

The composition of the Broad Street - Church Street Historic District is that of a typical north-south, east-west street grid pattern of land subdivided for residential building in the early 1900s. The eastern boundary of the district along Church Street is one lot before the intersection with Pine Street and on Broad Street it is at the intersection of Sumrall Road and the boundary of the Keys Hill National Register district. Eleven streets in the district run in a north-south direction and include from west to east: High School Street, Jackson Street, Oak Avenue, West Avenue, East Avenue, Park Avenue, Alberta Avenue, Branton Avenue, Chapman Street, and White Street. The western boundary of the district is High School Street from Broad Street to Church Street and along Church Street one lot east of the Downtown Columbia National Register district. Five streets run in the east-west direction and intersect with the north-south streets. The southern boundary of the district is Broad Street and the northern boundary is Church Street with Mary Street, Ferrill Street, Porter Street, Mayfield Street, and Mobley Street, between them. The east-west streets are only one to two blocks long in the district. Church and Broad Streets are the major streets in the district and really give definition to the district boundary. All of the boundaries include both sides of the streets.

The grid pattern to the streets in the district is not regular and there does not seem to be a common pattern to the size of the blocks. For the most part the lots closer to the western boundary, or the commercial downtown area, are larger and they get progressively smaller toward the eastern boundary, although there are few exceptions here and there. Most of the lots on a single block are fairly close in width size giving a very regular pattern to the houses. The streetscape is also enhanced by very similar setbacks within the blocks. In fact there are only a very few examples of structures that sit much farther back than their neighbors. Some of the blocks have large scale development including those with churches and the two schools. Those developments are spread throughout the district. The topography of the district is relatively flat. Most of the lots in the district have a degree of casual landscaping and there are numerous old growth trees throughout the district.

Commercial development in the district has mostly taken place along Broad Street which according to Sanborn maps was residential in nature up until at least 1946, the date of the last map for Columbia. Now the street is a mix of residential, commercial, and offices. Since Main Street turns into Broad Street which then runs out to a state highway it is no surprise that the residential buildings gave way to commercial development as the population grew and additional commercial and professional space was needed. The 300 block of Church Street closest to the downtown also has historic houses; however they have been converted to office and retail space with one converted to a restaurant.

There are two important religious structures in the district built during the period of significance. One is the First United Methodist Church located at 411 Church Street built in 1914 (#106) in the Gothic Revival style and the Columbia Presbyterian Church at 500 Church Street built 1958 (#116) in the Tudor Revival Style. Another significant, albeit much smaller frame church, in the district that is now used for commercial purposes. The church was formerly the Holy Trinity Catholic Church at 705 Church Street (#135) and was built circa 1910.

There are two historic schools remaining in the district. One is the Columbia Elementary School at 401 Mary Street (#228). It is located at the corner of High School and Mary Streets on the site of the former Columbia High School which was built in 1908 and burned in 1956. In 1938 the High School was converted into the Elementary School when the new High School opened. The current Columbia Elementary School is one-story and modern in design constructed in 1957. The other historic school is the Columbia High School which was built to replace the 1908 High School between 1937 and 1938. The new High School was built further east from the old location on a much larger piece of land at 1009 Broad Street (#76).

Across from the Columbia High School on Broad Street is the Columbia City Park (#206a). According to Sanborn Fire Insurance maps the land the park is on has been an open space since 1925, although the area is at the edge of the map so not much of it shows. On the 1915 Sanborn map that area of Columbia does not show at all. On 1931 – 1946 map that area is labeled 'Park' on the index sheet. The park contains paths, benches, picnic tables, a small brook with wood bridges, a modern two-story wood timber pavilion, and a recently built restroom building. Behind the Park and separated by a road at the edge of the Park is the Columbia Waterworks building (#288) which was constructed between 1947 and 1949.

There are a few non-residential buildings in the district that have had interesting prior uses. The building at 335 Second Street (#296), built circa 1930, was listed as a telephone exchange on the 1931, and 1931 – 1946 Sanborn maps. It has recently suffered an interior fire and it appears that it was used as an office before the fire. The building next to 335 Second Street at 337-339 Second Street (#297) was built around the same time and was listed as a rooming house on the 1931 Sanborn map and on the 1931 – 1946 Sanborn map was listed as a hospital and shows an addition to the east. It is now retail space. The building at 518 High School Street (#219) built circa 1940 was used as the Coca-Cola bottling plant in Columbia and still retains the cast stone Coca-Cola sign on the front of the building. It is now used as office space.

There is one property in the Broad Street - Church Street Historic District that has been previously listed on the National Register. The Lampton/Thompson/Bourne House at 423 Church Street (#109a – 109d) was listed on the National Register in 1998. In addition to the house there are three surviving contributing outbuildings on the property listed in the nomination.

The majority of the contributing resources in the district are representative of residential development typical in Mississippi for the time. They vary in size, style, and construction dates from large two-story homes, to more modest one-story homes, to small cottages, and even duplexes and one apartment building. There is one area of the district that has larger more architecturally impressive homes along the 400 block of Church Street. There are other impressive and architecturally significant homes spread throughout the district but not in the concentration of the 400 block of Church Street. The 500 to 700 blocks of Church Street have a good collection of more modest homes that retain a good deal of integrity. Towards the eastern edge of the district, and farthest away from the commercial downtown area of Columbia, the houses are not as old; however they are still significant as there are over fifty years old and retain architectural integrity from their original construction. Major architectural styles represented in Columbia are those of the late nineteenth to mid-twentieth century and include: Queen Anne, Free Classic Queen Anne, Colonial Revival, Tudor Revival, Spanish Revival, Craftsman, Art Moderne, Minimal Traditional, and Ranch.

The oldest house in the district, built circa 1885, is located at 1021 Church Street (#177a) which is a good distance from the downtown area of Columbia. It was originally two rooms with a center hall and was expanded in 1919.¹ There does not seem to have been much additional early development in that area suggesting that it was a very rural portion of the town at the time. The majority of residential development in the district began closest to Main Street and the commercial center of Columbia along Broad and Church Streets and expanded east as additional land was subdivided for residential development. The early homes being built close to town favored the Queen Anne and Free Classic Queen Anne style. This is very logical since the railroad came to town in 1899 allowing for the delivery of the mass produced architectural features that are a staple of the Queen Anne style of architecture fashionable at the time. These architectural features were available due to production techniques of the “Industrial Age” that produced standardized house parts such as machine-planed siding, structural lumber, and decorative details such as turned columns, balustrades, frieze work, and decorative trim. Church Street has several one-story examples of houses in the Queen Anne style including 345 (#105), 432 (#114a), 515 (#122) and 606 (#126a) all built around 1905. Other Queen Anne style houses include 507 Broad Street (#43), 515 Broad Street (#44a), 614 Broad Street (#51), and 616 High School Street (#221). Also popular in Columbia was the Free Classic Queen Anne style featuring houses with Queen Anne massing and Colonial Revival details especially the use of classical order columns. Again there are significant examples on Church Street at 418 (#107), 423 (#109a), 431 (#113a), 701 (132), and twin houses at 711(#140) and 713 (#142). These were all built circa 1905 to 1909. There also is a very significant Free Classic Queen Anne Style house on Broad Street at 403 (#22a) built circa 1895 that retains a great deal of integrity.

As styles transitioned from Queen Anne to Colonial Revival there were several houses built in the new style although not as many as the Queen Anne or Free Classic Queen Anne styles. The house at 329 Church Street (#102) is a significant two-story example and there is another significant one-story example at 1314 Church Street (#205). Other examples of the Colonial Revival style include 610 Branton Avenue (#16) and a later two-story apartment building at 720 Broad Street (#62).

The Craftsman style became very popular in Columbia most likely due to the availability of materials via the railroad and a move to a simpler, more restrained style from the previous highly decorative Queen Anne homes and the classical Colonial Revival homes. The Craftsman homes constructed in the district were much more modest than previous homes with simplified massing, low-pitched roofs with open eaves and exposed rafters, decorative knee braces in gable ends, gable-front or other porches including matching porte cocheres, low porch walls, and masonry piers with simple wood boxed columns. They were scattered throughout the district although there are more farther east in the district. There are several outstanding examples in the district of the Craftsman style including 407 Broad Street (#24), 414 Broad Street (#28), 428 Church Street (#111a), and 430 Church Street (#112a). Other good examples of the style include 421 Broad Street (#30a), 613 Broad Street (#50), 601 Church Street (#124), 610 Church Street (#129), 709 Church Street (#138), 904 Church Street (#160), 609 East Avenue (#207), 705 High School Street (#222a), 1115 Mayfield Street (#246a), 615 Oak Avenue (#266a), and 911 Porter Street (#293).

Interestingly there was one Spanish Colonial Revival House built in the district circa 1924 at 421 Mary Street (#233).

The Tudor Revival style was also used in Columbia; however it was not as popular as previous styles as there are only a few examples built in the district. There are brick sided examples at 1005 Broad Street (#74) and 614 West Avenue (#301a), a wood sided example at 711 Broad Street (#60), and a stone and brick example at 1114 Church Street (#186a).

There are two outstanding examples of the Art Moderne style in the district. One is the Columbia High School at 1009 Broad Street (#76) built 1937 – 1938 and the other is the Columbia Waterworks building at 902 Park Street (#288) built 1947 – 1948. Both have strong horizontal lines and were constructed of reinforced concrete. The High School was designed by the prolific Mississippi firm of Overstreet and Town Architects and is probably the best example of a school in that style in the state.

Just before World War II a new style called Minimal Traditional emerged combining elements of earlier styles. The new houses also started to incorporate garages as part of the structure instead of relegating them to outbuildings or using a porte cochere for vehicles. The new Minimal Traditional style favored smaller type cottages embellished with Colonial Revival details, and used simple side gable, cross gable or hip roofs. Also incorporated were multi-paned windows with applied shutters. A number of these houses were constructed in the district, mostly at the eastern end. Good examples include 612 Alberta Avenue (#2), 613 Alberta Avenue (#3), 913 Broad Street (#71), 1211 Church Street (#193a), 613 Oak Avenue (#264a), 611 Park Avenue (#275), and 698 White Street (#312).

The boom of housing construction after World War II used the Minimal Traditional style but also started using the Ranch style featuring more streamlined and horizontally massed houses with less classical detail. Again the majority of the Ranch Houses were built at the eastern end of the district. Good examples of the style include 701 Alberta Avenue (#6), 1003 Broad Street (#73), 603 Chapman Avenue (#92), 1214 Church Street (#196), 1217 Church Street (#198), 423 Mary Street (#235), and 612 Park Avenue (#276).

Throughout the district some of the houses have been sided in vinyl or aluminum siding and some of the original windows have been replaced with new modern windows mostly of metal. Several residential structures with front porches have been modified with new columns and removal of decorative features. The vast majority of the non-contributing elements in the district have either been constructed after the period of significance or built during the period of significance and have been heavily altered and no longer retain their historic integrity.

Inventory of Resources

C = Contributing element; NC = Non-contributing element
PL = Previously listed on the National Register

The inventory is arranged alphabetically by street name in ascending numerical order. Buildings are classified as “contributing” (c) or “non-contributing” (NC) to the historic character of the district. Properties that have already been listed on the National Register are designated as “previously listed” (PL).

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Summary

The Broad Street - Church Street Historic District, located in Columbia, Mississippi, represents an example of residential development in the early twentieth century on subdivided land outside of the commercial center to accommodate the growth of a small, but developing town. The district has a rich tapestry of building styles, sizes, and construction dates, all of which give the district a unique pattern of development and character. The Broad Street - Church Street Historic District is eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places for significance under criteria A in the area of community planning and development, and criteria C in the area of architecture. The period of significance is from c. 1885, the date of the earliest resource in the district, to 1958, fifty years prior to this nomination. The district's significance also derives from a concentration of intact residential, religious, and educational resources illustrating not only the popular architectural styles of the period between 1885 and 1958, but also vernacular forms common at the time.

The history of the Broad Street - Church Street Historic District is closely tied to the history of the development of downtown Columbia. As the downtown grew with new commerce and industry so did the residential area east of the commercial core. With the increase in population the residential area of Columbia developed with houses for the new successful merchants and those for the workers of the new mill and factories. Those structures offer built proof of the eras in which the town expanded and the styles that were current in those eras.

Town Founding to 1899

Although the town of Columbia was founded as the county seat of Marion County (originally comprising all the area of present-day Marion, Lawrence, Pike, Walthall and parts of Covington, Lincoln, Lamar, Pearl River, and Jefferson Davis counties¹) in the early nineteenth century and actually served as the temporary state capitol from February 27, 1821 to November 28, 1821, it did not begin its period of rapid growth until the very end of the nineteenth century. The Pearl River brought settlers to the area mainly from South Carolina and thus they named the new river settlement 'Columbia' for their former state capitol.² Through much of the nineteenth century, Columbia served as the primary trading center connecting the agriculture of Marion County to the keel boats and steamboats which plied the Pearl River from Jackson, Mississippi to the Gulf Coast.³ The land surrounding Columbia was never good enough to support many large plantations, but small farms were able to prosper by growing cotton and corn as cash crops and food crops for the family.⁴ The Pearl River served as the main transportation route to Columbia and served the town until the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad arrived in 1899.

Early Expansion of Columbia East of the Commercial Core

The railroad was a great boon to Columbia as goods could more easily and readily flow in and out of Columbia. Beginning in 1900, Columbia was home to a mere 500 and by 1910, the population exploded into 2,009.⁵ With the expansion of Columbia the old frame courthouse no longer suited the growing town and county and a new courthouse was constructed in 1905 in the Neoclassical Revival style at the end of Main Street.⁶ In 1907, a second railroad, the New Orleans Great Northern (later the Gulf, Mobile, and Northern, and then the Gulf, Mobile, and Ohio) built its line across the Pearl River into Columbia, connecting Columbia with New Orleans and Jackson, Mississippi.⁷ With the expanding railroad service commerce increased and businesses such as Hill Hardware Co., Inc., the Lampton Company, and Sandy Hook, George F. and James W. Hart, Inc. had successful operations in downtown Columbia.

With the success of their new operations the business owners began building houses worthy of their new status as successful merchants. Ornate Queen Anne style cottages sprung up along Church, Broad, and Mary Streets just east of the commercial core of Columbia along Main Street. Church Street directly intersects with Main Street and Broad Street intersects with the courthouse square at the end of Main Street. W. A. Hill of Hill Hardware built a Free Classic Queen Anne cottage at 431 Church Street (#113a) that is elegant with stylish features for the time such as the wraparound porch supported by Tuscan columns and a leaded cut glass entry. On the interior, the home contains distinctive curly pine wainscoting in combination with virgin pine lumber that covers the living and dining room walls. This paneling was added in 1913 contributing to the opulence of the fifteen-foot ceilings.⁸ Architect Harry N. Austin, of Jackson, Mississippi, and local contractor W. A. McDavid, built the house for Henry Mounger, Sr. and his wife at 418 Church Street (#107) in 1910. Abundant classical articulation is used on the edifice including a trio of Queen Anne style windows with window hoods displaying bas-relief garlands, pilasters, and a wraparound porch with Ionic columns that support an entablature. On the interior, the home has twelve and one half foot ceilings. Dudley Lampton moved his family into a newly constructed Free Classic Queen Anne cottage at 423 Church Street (#109a) in 1907. That house later called the Lampton-Thompson-Bourne House was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1998. The architect for the house was George F. Barber of Knoxville, Tennessee. Dudley Lampton, belonged to a prominent Columbia family who organized the B. Lampton and Sons Company in 1880. It later became The Lampton Company in 1901 with Dudley Lampton serving as one of the early presidents of the business.⁹

The Rise and Fall of the J.J. White Lumber Company

In 1911, Hugh Lawson White (1881-1965) purchased seventeen thousand acres of pine forest in Marion County and shortly after that investment The J. J. White Lumber Co. opened.¹⁰ White was at the helm and mill jobs boosted the employment numbers in Columbia and all of Marion County. Such residents as a Mr. Sedgewick, who worked as a mill sales manager, added new homes to the community. Sedgewick built a yellow heart pine Craftsman Bungalow at 407 Broad Street (#24), in 1911.¹¹ The lumber mill and other businesses which came to town around the same time, such as Coca-Cola, added to the expanding population.

When World War I ended, prosperity came to the U.S. and into small town Columbia. During the decade of the twenties, twelve passenger trains a day ran through Columbia. By 1925, the population in Columbia had risen to 3,500.¹² Altogether, by the end of the 1920s, Columbia boasted eight major industries besides the White company, including the Columbia Compress Company and Columbia Ice and Power Company.¹³

After World War I, and between 1930 14% of the buildings in the district were constructed. Most of the houses built were of the Craftsman Bungalow style with low hip roofs, wide porches, and exposed rafter tips. Unlike their Queen Anne predecessors these were built for more modest families and are scattered throughout the district. There was however two notable Craftsman

Bungalows built at 426 (#110) and 428 (#111a) Church Street in the same block as some of the most architecturally significant houses in the district.

As the decade progressed, the number of pine trees declined and the pine forests were diminished to such an extent that the J. J. White Lumber Mill closed in 1929.¹⁴ Although the largest employer in Columbia was gone, the company's owner, Hugh White, remained. By that time he was the Mayor of Columbia and was not willing to let Columbia fall into ruin.

The Columbia Plan

With the help of several prominent Columbia citizens, Mayor White decided to fight the decline of Columbia. They developed the Columbia Plan in 1929 which was the forerunner of the Balance Agriculture with Industry (BAWI) program that led White to the Governor's office in 1936. White was a businessman and politician with vision. Timber and cotton had powered Mississippi's economy since the state's inception. White wanted to pioneer a new path for Columbia. The plan was simply not to rely on agriculture as the single provider for jobs in the city. At the time, there were too many natural roadblocks including soil erosion and boll weevils that made agriculture unstable. Mayor White combined forces with Columbian merchants to court industry to come to Columbia. Together this local group bought the land and built a building for the Reliance Manufacturing Company which agreed to come if the town would provide a building suitable for its operations. This the townspeople did, raising the money to build a huge plant north of Church Street in 1932. Other businesses also built in Columbia during the 1930s, including the Dorgan-McPhillips Packing Corporation, located south of town on High School Avenue, the Columbia Knitting Mill, the Kentucky Lumber Company (just north of the former White mill), and the Southern Naval Stores Company. It seems that the Columbia Plan was a success and together the new industries that came to Columbia played an important role in the town's development through the 1930s. The jobs they provided sustained the local economy during the Great Depression.¹⁵ In fact 11% of the houses in the district were built between 1930 and 1939 showing that those jobs provided the funds needed to build new houses. During this time the Tudor Revival style became popular around the country and Columbia was no exception with significant examples being constructed at 1005 Broad Street (#74) and 1114 Church Street (#186a).

With the growth in Columbia from the new industrial development a new school was needed for the children of the factory workers. In the mid-1930s the school board hired the Jackson architectural firm of Overstreet and Town to design the new Columbia High School (#76). Completed in 1937, the Columbia High School was applauded in Architectural Forum as well as The New Yorker magazine in 1938. Architectural Forum noted that modern schools were popping up around the country and the high school in Columbia was exceptional in the traditional south since it too was built in a modern idiom.¹⁶

Post World War II Development

When World War II ended employment numbers grew along with the population of Columbia which went from 4,900 in 1931 to 8,000 in 1946.¹⁷ Returning veterans with new families and factory workers needed housing. However, it took some time for the housing industry to recover after the war. Once it did recover in the late 1940s, houses were produced in record numbers. Capitalizing on federal assistance for war veterans, housing developers in Columbia built modest houses based on traditional Colonial Revival and Tudor Revival designs in a new style called Minimal Traditional. Columbia developers built numerous houses of this style in the district including significant examples of this style at 612 Alberta (#2), 913 Broad Street (#71), 1109 Church (#186a), and 613 Oak Street (#264a).

This expansion of development in Columbia called for a new water plant and in 1947 construction began on the Columbia Waterworks building (#289) behind the City Park on Park Street. Like the high school built ten years earlier, the Waterworks building was also of the Art Moderne style and was designed by the engineering firm of W.E. Mallet and Associates of Jackson. The capacity was rated at 1,500,000 gallons a day.

In 1953, Columbia voted to build a plant for the New Orleans Furniture Manufacturing Company. This vote was a landslide with 1304 in favor to 3 against the bond issue. Endorsement of a $550,000.00 bond issue was passed, securing some 350 to 400 jobs for the community. Governor Hugh White, serving his second term in office, pointed to this vote for industry as clear proof of the Balancing Agriculture with Industry in action¹⁸. Residential construction continued to keep pace with the new factory and once again popular styles changed and more modern streamlined streamlined Ranch style houses were built. Some good examples of the style in Columbia include 603 Broad Street (#48), 611 Church Street (#129), and 612 Park Avenue (#276). After the period of significance for this district houses continued to be built. In the 1960s and 1970s houses were built in the Ranch style replacing earlier houses or built on vacant lots throughout the district. From that period on there is a mix of new houses built with the modern version of the Creole Cottage, to the newer multiple hipped roof houses with a more French eclectic style.

Conclusion

Today the southern Mississippi town of Columbia is much as it was when a Chamber of Commerce brochure dating from the 1930s described the residential sections of the town as being filled with "...exquisite homes-charming homes-'homey' homes-palatial homes-modest homes-modern homes-old Southern homes-tiny homes-large homes-homes suitable for every income" and that the residential yards of Columbia are filled "with flowers, shrubs, beautiful lawns, and trees."¹⁹ These residences of stately Queen Anne cottages, Craftsman Bungalows, Tudor Revivals, Minimal Traditionals and other styles line the residential streets of the Broad Street - Church Street Historic District and represent Columbia's past economic successes. Columbia grew from a small river town before 1900 to one that prospered with the introduction of the railroad. The town then survived the Great Depression through a program of economic diversity emphasizing the development of industry and commerce in combination with agriculture which has helped to sustain Columbia through the twentieth century.

The Broad Street - Church Street Historic District is certainly a unique residential community in Mississippi and one that visually expresses the growth of Columbia from its early beginnings to one that decided to balance agriculture with industry which has made it the city it is today. Buildings of different styles of architecture from circa 1885 to the present survive, giving the Broad Street - Church Street Historic District a unique mix of significant historic structures which give Columbia its unique historic character.
