PHYSICAL DESCRIPTION

This small, one-story bungalow is built of stone and exhibits several Craftsman design features. The gabled medium-pitched roof has two low shed dormers toward the front of the house. A porch extends the length of the house and is characterized by low stone walls capped with concrete. Similar stone walls at the base of the stoop extend along the entry sidewalk. The porch shed roof has open eaves and is supported by truncated boxed wood columns which rest on the porch walls. There is a stone chimney on the west facade adjacent to a shed carport. Front windows are triplet, three-over-one light, wood casement, one placed on each side of the central entry. Other windows are smaller three-over-one light casement. All windows are wood frame.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE/HISTORY

The house at 515 East 3rd Street is the best local example of its construction material in combination with its building style. The building is of uncut native fieldstone and retains many Craftsman design features. The quality of workmanship in stylistic detailing is apparent and the house has been little modified. The well-maintained building makes a unique and qualitative contribution to the architectural fabric of the neighborhood.

It is the best example of the three remaining uncut field stone residences in Casa Grande and exemplifies the craftsman style of stone masonry with hidden mortar joints popularized by Green and Green of California.
