Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The former John Reichert farmhouse is a two-story, cross-plan frame building with small decorative porches in its northeast and northwest angles. Gable ends facing east and north are filled with decorative struts and wood cut-work, crowning trompe l'oeil bay windows below. A gravel drive along the north side of the house also serves the frame "carriage house" (garage and loft) several yards from the northwest corner of the house. Situated among tilled fields in the outskirts of the city of Mequon, the recently-restored house appears today as it might have when newly-constructed nearly a century ago.

A coursed, rusticated-stone foundation supports the building, and recently-replaced wood shingles cover the cross-gable roof. Windows, generally a pair per story on each face of the gable arms, are symmetrically-disposed; delicate denticulated entablatures or profiled moldings cover the double-hung sash. Imbricated shingles above and below paired windows on the east and north gable ends suggest bays, trimmed with flat wood "brackets," saw-tooth moldings, and circular medallions. The small front and rear porches are composed of saw-tooth and finial-trimmed pierced valences supported by thin capital-trimmed posts. Iron cresting trims the half-deck of the front porch roof, and a simple balustrade guards the north side. The simpler rear porch is open. Both have flat, baluster-pattern wood skirts. The single four-panel wood doors are trimmed with a center saw-cut molding, and framed by flat "bracketed" moldings. A single diamond-shaped window (bordered with small Queen Anne panes) appears in the closed bay (inside vestibule) of the front porch; and a single oculus lights the interior stair from the west side of the south gable end. Interior chimneys rise from the ridge of the west (rear) and east (front) arms of the building. A one-story shed-roof addition is included in the southwest angle.

The interior decoration is modest; a beveled-glass transom over the paneled door in the vestibule and stencilled baseboard along the enclosed stair are the sole elegant notes. The original simple door and window moldings and wood floors (maple on the first story, pine plank on the second) are intact. Remodeling has been restricted to the kitchen, and conversion of one small bedroom (of the four on the second floor) to a master bath.

Constructed in 1980, a compatible carriage house (garage and storage loft) is located several yards northwest of the house. Likewise covered with clapboards and a wood shingle roof, the one-and-one-half-story structure is fitted with the same double-hung windows with denticulated entablatures that appear on the house. Frames over the garage door on the south side and loft door on the east side are mitered. A pair of gables rise from the south slope of the gable roof, and a small louvred cross-gable cupola with weather vane marks the ridge. The one-story shed-roof extension to the rear (north) is lighted by a diamond-shaped window on the east side. Although the building visually enhances the site, its recent construction prevents technical inclusion in the nomination.

Of the original outbuildings associated with the house, only a small shed to the north remains; it and the surrounding eighty acres of the original farm now belong to other owners. (A barn once located on the property was demolished in the 1970s.)

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Preserved into the twentieth century with full integrity and recently restored to excellent condition, the John Reichert Farmhouse, a frame stick style design, is the Mequon area's best representative of its period of construction. Although the decoration of the two-story house is restrained and abbreviated, the effect is more elaborate than that of the typical Queen Anne farmhouse of the period. A compatible "carriage house" (garage) to the rear strengthens the visual and period quality of the site, although its recent date of construction (1980) prevents its technical inclusion in the nomination.

The building, presumably the second on the site,² dates to the ownership of John Reichert. Various owners of the previous building and property, and of the house itself, were among the earliest or³ well-known settlers of the area. Jesse Hubbard, who owned the property in the 1840s,³ was described as "...an early settler in Mequon,"⁴ and "...prominent in county affairs during the early days...;"⁵ subsequent owners the Corcorans were listed among the "early Irish families in the Town...;"⁶ and later owner Joseph Reichert (late 1880s-1890s) was elected Superintendent of Schools during his residency in the house.

The house was designated as a Mequon Landmark in 1981.

¹ Inspection of tax records for the property from 1879 through the 1890s suggest that the house was constructed previous to the only conspicuous rise in valuation during the period.

² Early plat maps of the area show the appearance of the building on the site sometime between 1867 and 1873; the property deed first specifically mentions a building on the eighty-acre parcel in 1879. Visual inspection of the present building strongly suggests that the construction is consistent, and not the result of extensive alteration of an earlier building.
