DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Union Passenger Terminal was designed by Gilbert Stanly Underwood, of Los Angeles, and completed in 1931. An Omaha firm, Peter Kiewit and Sons, was awarded the one and one-fourth million dollar contract for the construction of the major unit.

The terminal is of steel frame construction on reinforced concrete piling. The exterior gives a massive masculine appearance. It's exterior is of cream-colored glazed terra cotta. Over the doors of the north main entrance are sculptured figures of a brakeman and locomotive engineer; over the 10th Street (west) entrance are figures of a civil engineer and railroad mechanic. Speaking at the time the Omaha station was built, the architect, Gilbert S. Underwood said, "We have tried to express the distinctive character of the rail-road -- strength, power, masculinity."

The interior is finished in plaster with Oregon pine, and white oak trim. The floor is of terrazo and concrete. The main floor waiting room has ten cathedral-like windows of rose, amber, and green translucent plate glass, flanked by columnettes of blue Belgian marble, and a wainscoting of black Belgian marble. This main floor waiting room is lighted by crystal and bronze chandeliers weighing two-thousand pounds each. At the east end is a bronze tablet commemorating the breaking of the ground and start of construction on the Union Pacific Railroad, the laying of the first rail, and the driving of the golden spike at Promontory, Utah.

On the west wall in the restaurant are six murals by Artist Joseph W. Keller, also of Los Angeles. These murals depict various stages in the development of transportation.

A covered concourse on the north connects the Union Passage Terminal with the Burlington Station (also reconstructed in 1930).

The building at present stands vacated and virtually unchanged since it's construction in 1930.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Gilbert S. Underwood was considered at the time of the design of the Union Terminal, as an "ultramodern" architect. The Union Terminal typifies, in it's strength and masculinity, the numerous passenger stations Underwood designed as consulting architect to the Union Pacific System.

The particular design of the Union Terminal in Omaha can also be considered as typical of much of American "Utilitarian Architecture," or architecture which accomodated or made provisions for the rising mechanical thrust characterizing the period that began in the late nineteenth century and continued well into the twentieth century. The Union Terminals architectural styling begins to point to the seepage of European architectural influences. Particularly that of the Bauhaus and its "utilitarian look," and also that of the modernistic mode in architectural decoration, perhaps better exemplified is Underwoods later design for the San Francisco mint.

The completion of the Union Passenger Terminal and the reconstruction of the connected Burlington Station firmly established Omaha as an important railroad terminus in the midwest. With a daily passenger capacity of over 8,000 the Union Terminal served, besides the Union Pacific, the North Western, Rock Island, Milwaukee, Missouri Pacific and Wabash railroads. With the decline in recent years of the railroad passenger era, the Union Terminal was abandoned by the Union Pacific for passenger service. The building now stands vacated, although several feasible proposals have been made for its hoped for preservation as one of Omaha's finest landmarks.
