Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Trinity Episcopal Church is located at the southeast corner of Fifth and Utah (U.S. 59) in Atchison, about two blocks south of the central business district. It faces north toward Utah Street, which is the main east-west artery through Atchison.

The church was designed in the Early English Gothic style and was built of coursed limestone rubble. It is rectangular in plan, about 45 by 75 feet, with a projecting vestibule on the north end and a polygonal apse on the south. (A wing of the Parish Hall abuts the south end of the church and wraps around the apse, but it is not a part of the nominated building.) The church has parapet gables and a multicolored, patterned slate roof. There is no tower or steeple. Instead, an open bellcote (which never contained a bell) rises from the peak of the north gable.

The projecting vestibule is located in the center of the north facade. The double doors were installed in 1961. They were carved by Joe Ihasz, a Hungarian native who came to the United States in 1950. Above the vestibule is a pair of lancet windows surmounted by a small circular window. Two other lancet windows flank the vestibule, and two small ones are placed in the sides of the vestibule itself. The east and west walls once had seven lancet windows each, but the southernmost window on either side has been filled in. All the windows have stained glass. Most are memorial windows which have been installed through the years to commemorate members of the congregation. The walls are supported by stepped buttresses with diagonal buttresses at the corners.

The interior consists of a rectangular nave with a raised chancel at the south end. Beyond this is the apse, containing an altar of white Italian Carrara marble, which was installed in 1911. The rafters and pews are walnut and are original to the building, as are most of the chancel furnishings, although the pulpit and lectern are more recent. The only major change to the interior has been the removal of the stenciling which once adorned the walls.

Builder/Architect James C. Sidney of Philadelphia, PA

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Trinity Episcopal Church is significant both for its architecture and for its place in the history of the City of Atchison. It is one of the two finest and most intact examples of mid-nineteenth century English Gothic religious architecture in Kansas. (The other is St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Leavenworth. Other early churches in the English Gothic tradition in Kansas are either simpler or less intact.) Begun in 1866 and completed in 1868, it was designed, according to the vestry records, by "Mr. Sidney of Philadelphia." This was evidently James C. Sidney, an architect who practiced in Philadelphia in the 1860s and 70s, and who is known to have designed at least one other Episcopal Church.

The design of Trinity Church is believed to be based closely on that of Calvary Episcopal Church in Stonington, Connecticut, which was designed by Richard Upjohn and erected in 1848.

The congregation had its beginning in 1857, shortly after the founding of Atchison in 1854, the year Kansas was opened for settlement.

Among the early citizens of Atchison who belonged to Trinity Church was Alfred G. Otis, grandfather of flier Amelia Earhart. Otis was a vestryman at the time the church was built and participated in the selection of a builder. His daughter Amy was married to Edwin S. Earhart in Trinity Church in 1895, and their daughter, Amelia Earhart, was baptized there in 1897.

Another prominent early member of Trinity Church was John J. Ingalls, who served as a United States Senator from 1873 to 1891.

The rector of Trinity Church at the time this building was planned was the Rt. Rev. Thomas H. Vail, who was serving at the same time as the first Episcopal Bishop of Kansas.

Trinity Episcopal Church continues today to serve its congregation as a house of worship as it has for well over a century.
