Describe present and historic physical appearance.

Situated in the center of three spacious city lots in the small town of Cambridge, Idaho, the Salubria Lodge #31 is surrounded by large trees, green lawns and shrubs. The rectangular, two-story, front gabled building, measuring 76 ft by 28 ft., has a lower story constructed of stucco-finished poured concrete and a red brick upper story. The original wooden shingled roof remains intact under a newer metal roof covering recently added because of heavy snowfall in the area.

The smooth stucco finish of the basement story is pierced by widely-spaced small square windows, four each on the east and west walls. Centered on the front elevation is an enclosed gabled entrance porch covered by a wide overhanging steeply pitched roof with white-painted bargeboards and struts. The entrance is also flanked by two small square windows.

The upper story of the building is constructed of red brick. Simple, protruding string courses, at the sill and impost levels, unite ten tall arched double-hung windows ranging around three sides of the building. The two windows on the front elevation are of colored glass with the emblem of the Masonic order centered in each, while the other windows have clear glazing. The steeply pitched roof is accented by a wide flat bargeboard and five prominent diagonal brackets. The front facing shingled gable is defined by decorative brackets painted white and contains two small louvered attic vents. There is one opening on the rear wall of the structure.

The building's interior is dominated by a large auditorium, simply decorated with fir wainscoting, wooden flooring and a pressed metal ceiling. Other smaller service rooms include a lobby, storage area, kitchen and dining rooms, furnace and coal room, and rest rooms. Except for the covering over the roof, Salubria Lodge #31 has not been altered since its construction in 1922.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Salubria Lodge is significant under criterion A for its association with the social and cultural life of northern Washington County, or as this area is called, "The Upper Country."

During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Masonic lodges often were established within a few years after the founding of many Idaho towns. Lodges provided a meeting place for social events and a sense of fellowship and mutual support among its members. Masonic halls also were among the largest, most substantial, and elaborate buildings in a town, sometimes providing additional space for other commercial or cultural activities.

Although founded in Salubria in 1893, the Masons met in the I.O.O.F. hall until they moved to Cambridge in 1902. When the P & IN Railroad proposed to build a line through the Upper Country, many enterprising Salubria residents tried to profit from the venture by offering their land for inflated prices. Seeking cheaper land elsewhere, the railroad was finally built across the river, and the town of Cambridge grew up around it. When Cambridge was born in 1900, the town of Salubria slowly began to fade.

On February 7, 1902, the Masonic Order announced plans to build a new hall in Cambridge. A substantial two-story, wooden-framed building was erected, the upper floor being used for the lodge and the lower story for an opera house. Completed in August of that year, it boasted that it was "the best building in Cambridge."1 A memorial service and a dance were held to celebrate its completion, and over two hundred people attended the formal dedication ceremony on February 9, 1904. Being the social hub of this small farming community, the residents of Cambridge were devastated when this fine building was destroyed by fire in 1921.

Quick to recover, various groups in the town planned fund-raising events and bazaars to raise money to build a new lodge and to purchase a piano and other essential pieces of furniture. Watkins and Thompson, a building firm from Weiser, was hired to construct the new building. The ground breaking took place on May 8, 1922, and the following February the building was dedicated. Masons from the nearby communities of Council, New Meadows and Emmett participated in the two hour long ceremony. The Weiser Signal declared that "the Masonic Order is now installed in one of the best and most modern buildings of the Upper Country." 2

The Lodge was used primarily by the Masons, and since roughly one third of Cambridge residents were associated with the order, the hall was a significant gathering place for the town. Because the only other alternative for large assemblies was the upper floor of a store, occasionally non-Masonic events such as funerals and school banquets were held at the Lodge. Within the last decade membership has dwindled, following a national pattern, and the building is infrequently used. Large community events have been held in the junior high and senior high auditorium since the late 1950's.
