DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Smith-Little-Mars House is located at the crest of a tree-shaded bluff, approximately 100 yards above State Highway 63. The hillside location affords a panoramic view of the 320 acre farm which extends out in every direction, across the verdant valley floor. The perimeter of the landscaped garden is defined by a three-foot-tall, limestone retaining wall which fronts the lot. The wall was built by Silas Little who changed the style of the house to suit his Victorian tastes. Representing two distinct periods of construction, the earlier construction was the two-story brick section, designed in the symmetrical, one-by-three bay center hall plan, typical of the Tennessee vernacular form of the classic styles popular during the period. Characteristically, there is a two-story service wing extending to the back from one side. This wing is somewhat reduced in scale from the front section and the second-floor bedrooms in the wing are lower than the rooms across the front section. Silas Little added the columned portico and cantilevered balcony to the main facade. To enlarge the house, he built a frame addition within the former ell at the back. He enclosed the earlier rear porch and extended the center halls through the house. The grand center hall was thrown open to the left side parlor, and he designed columns for the hall to match those in the portico. The end wall fireplaces were changed by the addition of the tall, pilastered mantles and glazed tiles around the fireplace openings. The front bedrooms are the same size as the parlor rooms, and to these he added a large master bedroom in the frame addition. The keeping room and kitchen are located in the brick wing, behind the right side parlor and a new dining room and butler's pantry were built in the frame addition, with the main entry through the parlor suite. Features for the 1840 design include the brick wall fenestration, Flemish bond brick work and carved brick eaves. The original shutters are attached to the windows. In 1944, the present owner added modern plumbing and conveniences to the house, and has maintained this house as a summertime residence.

Little added the unusual stone barn, which is located 250 yards northeast of the house in 1919. Other frame structures on the property are a springhouse, smokehouse and storage buildings in the yard. The stone and frame cottage was built by a former slave who died before he had finished it. When the cottage was completed, it was used for the groundskeeper.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Smith-Little-Mars House was built by slave labor in 1840 for Frank Smith. Joshua Little, a circuit preacher in Powell Valley, purchased the property after the Civil War and sold the house and farm to his son, Silas, in the late 1890s. Silas, who operated a clothing business in Knoxville and became wealthy, built additions and added the Victorian refinements to the antebellum house. He died in 1927 and bequeathed the house and farm to his only daughter Gladys. She lived in the house for several years, but the property remained vacant while she lived in Knoxville. Thirteen years later it was restored to its 1890s appearance by the present owner.

This is one of the few remaining antebellum houses in the county. The farm has retained much of its original character through continued use. All of the original architecturally important outbuildings have been maintained, and vestiges of the fine Victorian gardens have been preserved.

The topography of the picturesque Powell Valley is characteristic of East Tennessee, its rolling hills, forested ridges, and productive valleys attracted pioneers who settled there and became wealthy before the Civil War. The Smith-Little-Mars House is located in a sparsely populated, rural area at the edge of Campbell County, and the surrounding countryside has remained essentially unchanged for over a century.

It is interesting to note that the integrity of the original antebellum design for the Frank Smith house was not radically effected by the late Victorian additions of the 1890s. The house has been compared to others in Campbell and Claiborne counties which were built by slaves belonging to John Kincaid II. Kincaid was a prominent early settler in this region and his only daughter was the wife of Silas Little. Legend assumes that slaves belonging to Kincaid did much of the construction work, manufactured the brick, and cut the limestone blocks. This would account for the similarity of the proportions and overall design of the brickwork to other antebellum houses which were built by Kincaid. The original deeds and contracts for this property were destroyed when the courthouse in Jacksboro burned. The 1840 construction date is confirmed because slaves who built the house carved their names and this date into one of the beams under the original section of the house.
