Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The mid-18th century character of the Amos Fuller House is greatly enhanced by its setting which includes a 19th century barn and outbuilding surrounded by 26 acres of woods and open fields. This nomination comprises only a portion of that land. However the total acreage as a green enclave encircled by and protected from Needham's suburban development enhances the character of the house. The house sits back approximately 100 feet on the east side of Nehoiden Street; the barn is located a similar distance to the south, and the shed to the east.

In its present sprawling configuration, the dwelling presents an organic and evolutionary architectural character as the result of alterations and additions through time. Nevertheless, the original compact leanto structure of 1754 remains apparent. Similarity of construction and exterior finish help tie the house together visually: timber framing and clapboard sheathing painted yellow with white trim. Wood shingles cover the main block roof and integral additions; asphalt shingles the large rear ell.

The original leanto portion stands 2½-stories tall on a mortared fieldstone foundation. Distinctive features of the symmetrical 5-bay facade include: a simple enclosed gabled entry porch; narrow cornice and corner boards; original 9/6 windows on the second story and later, wider 6/6 windows on the first story, all with projecting surrounds. The north and south gable ends also retain original 9/6 windows; the rear and ell elevations, later 6/6.

Although the interior was extensively rebuilt in the 19th century, principally as a result of demolition of the central chimney c.1897, the original 5-room plan of the main portion is still apparent, and much original woodwork remains. Initial restoration work began in the 1830's when the property, then much deteriorated, was sold by the Fuller family. All or a portion of the large rear ell most likely dates from this period. The remains of a chimney foundation with fireplace and beehive oven are visible in the ell basement.

During the 1920's and subsequently a series of additional changes occurred including addition of the sunporch (south side), shed dormer (rear), exterior chimney (north-side) with concurrent renovations of north parlor, and rear ell exterior chimney.

The barn which stands to the south was built about 1830 to replace an earlier barn which was hit by lightning and destroyed by fire. The present barn (approx. 36' x 60') is the oldest extant barn in town and is constructed with massive hand-hewn timbers held together with wooden-pegged mortice and tenon joints. It is shingled and stained dark brown.

Another small building stands to the rear of the house. It was built during the 1850's by Artemas Newell to serve as his law office. Interior partitions have been removed (c.1920) to create a single space.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Amos Fuller House retains integrity of location, design, materials, workmanship, setting, feeling and association. Historical significance is derived from its association with important local figures of the 18th and 19th century; architectural significance from its standing as the best preserved example of its type and period in Needham. The property thus meets criteria A, B, C of the National Register of Historic Places.

This house was built "on the road to the meetinghouse" in 1754 by Lt. Amos Fuller, a son of Thomas Fuller, Jr., one of the earliest settlers in the town and a descendant of settlers of the parent town, Dedham. The house occupies the site of an earlier house built by his father, Thomas Fuller, and material from the earlier house may have been used in the present structure. Lt. Amos Fuller lived in the house until his death in 1810. He served the town as selectman (1737-1769) and representative to the General Court (1756-1766).

In 1830 the house was sold by Reuben Fuller, the son of Amos, to the Reverend William Ritchie, the fourth minister of the parish; it was occupied by him until his death in 1842 and by his widow until 1852. The house had deteriorated during the occupancy of Reuben Fuller, and was extensively rebuilt and restored by the Reverend William Ritchie.

The barn which adjoins the house is of historical interest in its own right because of its age and its construction -- massive hand beams and wooden-pegged joints. The oldest of the few remaining old barns in the town, it was probably built by the Reverend William Ritchie after a fire caused by lightning in the 1830's. Research conducted by Mr. James M. McCracken in the 1930's tends to confirm this date, although the barn is not specifically mentioned in town records until 1860.

In 1852 the house and property was bought by Artemas Newell, and it remained in the Newell Family until 1920. Artemas Newell an attorney and important town figure long known as "Squire Art" built the third structure presently standing on the property, the small "shop" behind the house which he used as his law office. By 1869 the property consisted of forty acres, and the Newell family ownership is memorialized in Newell Avenue, which runs from the site of the present house to Great Plain Avenue. Some time after 1897, a later and eccentric Newell, Augustus, tore down part of the old central chimney of the house for the value of the old bricks; he was stopped only by the threatened collapse of the house, which was supported in part by the chimney. This same Augustus Newell also manufactured concrete blocks on the property and is the earliest known to do so in the area.

In 1922 the property was bought by Mr. James M. McCracken, Sr., who re-named it Hearstone Farm and did notable work in restoring and preserving the historic structures on it. Since 1928 the town has shared the property with the McCracken Family. In that year Mr. McCracken gave the Needham troop of Girl Scouts an annual license to a piece of the property which fronts on Rosemary Lake (not included in nomination). The area is called Camp Malcolm in memory of the McCracken's first son.
