Narrative Description

The Hillsboro-West End Historic District (HWE) is a large residential district located in western Nashville. This district occupies the area between two of the city's principle western arteries, West End Avenue and 21st Avenue South/Hillsboro Pike. To the north is the Vanderbilt University campus, greatly expanded in recent decades, as well as two historically vital commercial corridors, those of West End Avenue and Hillsboro Village. Another commercial center is at the intersection of 21st Avenue South and Blair Boulevard, on the immediate eastern edge of the district. The southern boundary is easily defined at the "canyon" of Interstate 440, completed in 1987, which connects the eastern and western approaches to Nashville while bypassing downtown.

Within these boundaries is a residential area whose character has remained largely intact despite development pressures in this part of the city. The survey conducted for this nomination determined that 79% (996 of 1270) of the structures in the neighborhood contribute to its historic character. These residences were constructed primarily during the first quarter of the 20th century, with most development occurring after World War I. The majority of the houses are one to two-stories, and built in popular styles of the period using light wood frame construction. Detached garages are not uncommon behind the houses, some of which back up to common service alleys.

The terrain of the district is undulating with three prominent hills in the central and western sections. At 746 feet, Love Circle Hill is the highest point in the district. Overlook Circle Hill reaches 700 feet, and Barton Avenue-Essex Place Hill rises to just over 660 feet. Most of the rest of the terrain ranges from 580 feet to 610 feet above sea level. The area is distinguished by large numbers of mature trees, including hackberries, oaks, and maples.

Prior to the turn of the century, the district was mostly undeveloped farmland. Although a number of educational institutions had been founded in the area in the late 19th century -- Vanderbilt (1874), Roger Williams University (1864), and Belmont Junior College (1890) -- the Hillsboro-West End area developed later than other nearby neighborhoods. Early residential development followed the construction of street car lines, none of which had penetrated the Hillsboro-West End area. Until 1910, the development that did occur was overflow from the filling streetcar suburbs of Belmont to the east and Richland-West End to the West. After 1910, however, subdivision began in earnest with the opening of the Hillsboro streetcar line south on Hillsboro Pike to its terminus at Blair Boulevard. This new wave of residential development saw the complete subdivision of the land and a remarkable wave of home-building. Newspaper articles of the period attest to the rapid growth and development of the neighborhood in the 1910s.

Two houses are located in HWE whose construction precedes that of the areas's development as a residential neighborhood. The first of these is Glen Oak (NR 11/17/83), at 2012 25th Avenue South. This two-story, frame, Gothic Revival structure was built in 1854 by Charles Tomes, rector (1848-1857) of Christ Church (NR 11/14/78), Nashville's Episcopal congregation. Glen Oak is a large cross-gabled house with a three-story square tower on the northern end, which is topped by a ogee-shaped dome. Glen Oak is the oldest building in the neighborhood and is one of Nashville's most representative examples of the Gothic Revival style.

The other house in the area antecedent to neighborhood development is the frame, two-and-a-half story, Queen Anne residence at 2500 Woodlawn Drive. This dwelling is believed to have been the home of Matt. F. Allen, a prosperous manufacturer of coal and wood-burning stoves who lived in the Hillsboro-West End area from 1884 to 1890. Soon after its construction in the 1880s, the owner decided to build a new home on the same site, and had the house moved across Woodlawn Drive, where it remains today.

Most dwellings in Hillsboro-West End (HWE) were built between ca. 1910 and ca. 1935. Though its development was guided by the existing pattern of streetcar lines, the plan of the neighborhood was largely influenced through the growing popularity of the automobile. This influence is visible in the neighborhood through the lack of rear alleys and the relation of the garage to the dwellings of the district. Most garages are detached from their associated dwellings and are reached by a driveway from the street facade. Certain areas such as the Edgar Jones subdivision (Barton Avenue, Essex Place) were platted in 1910 with rear alleys for horse or auto access. Sunset Park, however, was platted in the same year without rear alleys. Excepting Westwood Avenue and Acklen Avenue west of Natchez Trace, most streets have sidewalks. Perhaps most unusual is the three-block pedestrian right-of-way extending north-south from Blair Boulevard to Linden Avenue. These blocks are particularly wide and pedestrian sidewalks were added to provide ease of access from one to another.

The houses of the Hillsboro-West End District are built in the myriad styles favored by the urban middle class across Nashville and throughout the United States during the early 20th century. Craftsman/Bungalow, Tudor Revival, Colonial Revival, American Foursquare, English Cottage, and Minimal Traditional styles are represented. Most are one or two story single-family structures with two or three bedrooms, indoor kitchens and baths, and front and rear yards.

HWE's architectural styles can be found elsewhere in Nashville. The Belmont-Hillsboro Historic District (NR 5-1-80) began its major period of development only slightly earlier than HWE, to HWE's east. Like HWE, it exhibits a high concentration of Bungalows and American Foursquares. Sylvan Park, a working class neighborhood north of HWE, was subdivided in the late 19th Century and contains a notable collection of more modest bungalows. The Woodland-in-Waverly Historic District (NR 3-25-82), in South Nashville, and especially the Richland-West End (NR 4-16-79), west of HWE, exhibit some of the same styles as HWE. Many houses in these areas, however, are higher style and more grand in scale. Bungalow, American Foursquare, and revival styles can be found throughout the city, but Hillsboro-West End is Nashville's largest, best preserved, and most cohesive early 20th Century middle class neighborhood. Further, it contains the city's most significant assemblage of Tudor Revival style dwellings.

All the major roads which radiate from the center of Nashville are developments of old roads and trails which meander out of town. Areas to the sides of these arteries, however, generally developed on non-north-south grids. The layout of HWE was typical, in this way, of other neighborhoods in Nashville, and in the use of a grid, illustrative of national patterns of urban development. HWE's relatively flat terrain made the layout of HWE's various subdivisions, on a northeasterly-southwesterly axis, easier than some other neighborhoods, such as hilly Belmont-Hillsboro. Individual lots in HWE measure 50' to 60' in width and 150' to 175' in depth. The Sunset Park subdivision was laid out with 100' wide lots, later subdivided by owners. Where the terrain is hilly, streets curved to conform to the topography -- West End Heights (Love Circle), Hillside Drive, and Westmoreland Drive.

With few exceptions, the buildings constructed in HWE were single-family dwellings. Most of the subdivision developments stipulated that only dwellings could be constructed and prohibited other types of uses. The Edgar Jones Subdivision deeds were written to restrict uses such as "shop, store, factory, saloon, or business house of any kind." Houses in this subdivision were required to cost at least $1,200, be set back 35' from the street, and permitted "no swine ... and no nuisance of any kind."

These restrictions resulted in most lots being developed with single-family dwellings. Duplexes were also constructed such as that at 2127 Blair Boulevard and the four unit apartment building at 2543 Blair Boulevard. Duplexes maintain the small scale and various architectural styles of the single family houses in the neighborhood. Large apartment buildings were constructed primarily on the edges of the district at West End and 21st Avenues between about 1914 and 1927. On West End Avenue were a row of stately apartment buildings such as the Westboro, the Courtland, the Gainsboro, and the Sulgrave. With the exception of the Westboro all of these apartment buildings have been demolished. On 21st Avenue the Washington (DOE 3/27/89) and Mayflower Apartments continue to stand but are located outside the boundaries of the district.

Residences built in HWE follow similar patterns of styles and construction techniques utilized across the country between 1910 and 1940. Early dwellings in the neighborhood are Pyramid Square and Foursquare dwellings built from c. 1905 to c. 1915. These dwellings are generally found close to West End Avenue and 21st Avenue near the early streetcar lines. Pyramid Square dwellings here have hipped roofs and Colonial Revival-inspired detailing. Examples of this form can be seen at 3105 Dudley Avenue and 3106 Dudley Avenue. American Foursquare designs were largely built along 21st Avenue but a few were also built within the district. Foursquares are two stories in height, square or rectangular in form, and have hipped roofs. The dwellings at 2400 Barton Avenue and 2907 Westmoreland Drive are good examples of Foursquare design.

A large number of Hillsboro-West End houses were built in the Bungalow style. Though the ancestry of the Bungalow is a divergent set of sources from Colonial India, Britain, and mid-nineteenth century Gothic architecture, its appearance first in California and later throughout the country is an American phenomenon. The early Bungalows, intended for mild climates, were adapted to fit a panorama of environmental conditions and building materials. The Bungalows of HWE reflect the nation-wide popularization of the style -- furthered by a population surge during the same period. By this time, pattern books and mail order houses like Sears and Aladdin had spread Bungalow plans, and sometimes the houses themselves, throughout the continent.

Bungalows of HWE reflected the prevailing attitudes toward housing in the early 20th century. The Bungalow offered solutions to what were considered design and function problems of Victorian Era domestic architecture. The principles of simplicity and vitality replaced eclecticism and exotica. Bungalows were built for the less formal lifestyle of the period. Large porches were often integral to designs as a means of extending the living space of the home out into nature and also bringing the outdoors into the life of the family. The effect was one of unity with the environment, in the interest of achieving a healthful, casual, modern lifestyle. Pattern books referred to the Bungalow as "the natural housing stock for humanity." In essence, the Bungalow was the intended housing for the emerging American middle class. The advantage of the Bungalow was that its limited size -- adequate for a single family -- could be contained on a lot of modest proportions, and was affordable to the average citizen.

Most Bungalows in HWE are side-gabled dwellings with a porch on the main facade. Most have interior or exterior wall brick chimneys, and brick or concrete foundations. Porches are almost always one-story in height and may be of a full width or single bay entry design. The variety of porch supports include brick piers, tapered box construction posts on stone piers, and turned Tuscan columns. Doors are generally 1/2 or 2/3 glazed single- or multi-light design. Windows are frequently 3:1 or 4:1 sash with vertical muntins, 1:1 sash, or variations of 6:6 or other multi-light designs. Eaves are wide with exposed rafters and knee braces. Gable and shed dormers are common. Examples of typical Bungalows which display these details include 2500 Linden Avenue and 316 Fairfax Avenues.

Bungalows were also built in gable front plans and with prominent shed dormers at the roofline. Many of these were built in the neighborhood, such as the dwelling at 2520 Fairfax Avenue. Another popular Bungalow design has a side gabled roof and prominent shed roof dormer. Known as Shed Bungalows, many of these can also be found in the neighborhood, such as that at 2521 Fairfax Avenue.

With the Bungalow, the other most common architectural style in HWE is the Tudor Revival. Tudor Revival houses have features loosely based on a variety of medieval English building traditions. The variety of materials and intricate combinations of design elements make these structures picturesque. The typical Tudor Revival dwelling has a gable-end roof with a steeply pitched projecting gable on the front facade. These gables are often faced with false half-timbering, with stucco usually filling the space between the timbers. Large, elaborate chimneys are often placed in prominent locations at the front or side of the house, with complex masonry or stone patterns figuring heavily in their decoration. Unlike the Bungalow, with its emphasis on the recreational front porch, Tudor Revival porches are often relegated to the corner or side of the house. Entrances are characteristically a location for decoration, including rounded doors, arched stone or brickwork, and gable entrance hoods.

Tudor Revival style dwellings can be found on most streets in HWE. These dwellings often have an exterior of colored, clinker, or rug brick as well as stucco and half-timbering in the gable fields. Good examples of this type are the houses at 1900 Natchez Trace and 3816 Blair Boulevard. Designers occasionally embellished these dwellings with medieval towers and crenellated parapets. The house at 2704 Woodlawn Avenue is notable for its corner tower of stone and brick veneer.

Another architectural style of importance in the district is that of the Colonial Revival and its subtype, the Dutch Colonial (characterized by a gambrel roof). The typical Colonial Revival house is a one or two-story symmetrical structure, of weatherboard or brick. The most common feature is an accentuated front door, often faced with a classical pediment and pilasters, or extending forward and supported by turned Tuscan columns to form an entry porch. Doors can have fanlights and sidelights, and are usually balanced by symmetrically spaced windows on the facade. Windows on Colonial Revivals usually have multi-light double hung sash, which are sometimes arranged in pairs. Nashville architect George D. Waller used the Colonial Revival style for his own home at 2527 W. Ashwood Avenue, built in 1924. This house has a full width porch with Tuscan columns, a roof balustrade, and three hipped dormers at the roofline.

Related to the Colonial Revival style are Minimal Traditional houses. These dwellings were constructed from the 1930s into the 1950s, and are almost exclusively one story, rectangular in form, with a gable-end roof, and an economical scale. Porches and original wings are rare. Ornamentation is usually limited to the doorway -- simplified classical details, in the Colonial Revival or Cape Cod vein, or a gable entrance hood with knee braces or brackets.

Other styles of the early 20th century were not built or are rare in the neighborhood. The Prairie style's influence is not evident except for the house at 2600 Essex Avenue. This dwelling has deep eaves with a flat soffit, large porches on two facades, and a low, horizontal appearance. The influence of the Spanish Revival style is minimal. Art Deco or Moderne dwellings were not built in the district.

The most common material for the exterior of dwellings in the district is brick. Brick veneers on light wood frame construction became the preferred technique for even the most modest cottages after masonry veneering techniques became widespread in the 1920s. Brick walls often have stone trim at windows and doors, and stucco or weatherboard in the gable fields. Stone veneer construction is also common. A lesser number of structures are faced with stucco. Cast stone (rock faced hollow core concrete block) masonry bearing wall houses are also present.

Though the Hillsboro-West End Historic District is composed almost entirely of residential structures, a few buildings of other functions are located within its boundaries. Two public schools exist within the historic district. The first of these, Cavert School, at 2500 Fairfax Avenue, a two-story brick structure, was built in 1928 as an elementary school to alleviate the overcrowding in the public schools of West Nashville. However, the need for additional space was so great that Eakin Elementary, a two-story brick structure, was constructed in 1936 adjacent to and just east of Cavert School. St. Bernard's Convent and Academy is also included in the district and is located at 2021 21st Avenue South. This three-story brick building was completed in 1905, with the academy for girls built behind the convent in 1960.

At 2001 Sharondale Drive is a brick telephone exchange building, constructed in 1939 in the Georgian Revival style, which continues to be operated by South Central Bell. Two churches are located within the boundaries of the district but both were built after 1941. A non-historic radio tower atop Love Circle Hill is the only structure in the district.

Commercial development was largely confined to the east and west edges of the neighborhood along 21st Avenue and West End Avenue. While these commercial areas retain many original buildings, alterations and adjacent intrusions have resulted in a loss of integrity. These areas have been omitted from the district.

The following is an inventory of properties within the boundaries of the Hillsboro-West End Historic District. The number in front of each address is either a survey number or a tax lot number. Five digit numbers starting with one zero refer to a survey conducted by the Nashville Metropolitan Historical Commission in 1988. Numbers with two or more zeroes before the remaining digits are tax lot numbers -- these properties were not given a survey number in 1988. Vacant lots are not cited in this inventory.

Each property in the district is ranked as contributing or noncontributing. Properties which are at least fifty years old, and which maintain their historic integrity are considered contributing. The descriptions of contributing properties are followed by "(C)". Properties less than fifty years old, or so altered that their historic integrity is irretrievable are considered noncontributing, and are indicated with "(NC)". Contributing or noncontributing status in this inventory does not always correspond with the determinations made during the 1988 survey. Accordingly, some properties which are considered contributing here will not have a five digit 1988 inventory number. There are 1270 buildings in the district, 996 of which have been determined to be contributing, and 273 of which have been determined to be non-contributing. There is one non-contributing structure in the district.

Unless otherwise noted, the material on roofs is asphalt shingles. Alterations are noted in parentheses.

NARRATIVE STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Hillsboro-West End Historic District (HWE) is significant under criterion C for its notable collection of architectural styles from the early Twentieth Century. This area of Nashville was largely platted and subdivided after 1900 as the city expanded to the west and south along streetcar lines. Development in the neighborhood was rapid and between 1910 and 1930, when over seven hundred fifty dwellings were constructed. The district contains many examples of house styles and forms from this period including Bungalow, Colonial Revival, Tudor Revival, American Foursquare, and Minimal Traditional. Intrusions into the neighborhood have been minimal, and the district retains much of its original character and integrity.

White settlement of the land that would become Hillsboro-West End Historic District began only a few years after pioneer settlers, led by James Robertson, established themselves on the bluffs of the Cumberland River in 1779. Three years later the North Carolina state legislature set aside their territory in Davidson County and the surrounding land as a military reservation. Grants of 640 acres were made as a payment to its revolutionary war soldiers, most of whom set up "stations" -- picketed forts -- on their land.

Five grantees received the land that became HWE. Three grants made up the largest part of the district. Thomas Brown's grant (where he established Brown's Station around 1784) covered most of the southeast portion of HWE. HWE's western half was granted to Francis Hodge, one of Nashville's original settlers and a signer of the Cumberland Compact, a document establishing civil government in the fledgling community. Hodge also established a small station on his land, just southwest of HWE's borders. Most of HWE's northeastern area was granted to Elijah Robertson, brother of James Robertson. Robertson was a land speculator who acquired many thousands of acres in Davidson County. Although he never settled on the HWE grant, his family retained ownership for four generations.

In the first half of the 19th Century, HWE lands became home to several large cotton and tobacco plantations -- industries responsible for much of Nashville's economic growth. In the decade between 1800 and 1810, the city's population more than tripled from 345 to 1,100. From 1797 through the early 1820s, the entire western half of HWE became part of Captain Joseph Erwing's cotton plantation. Another member of this merchant elite class, lawyer Jesse Wharton, located his estate in southeast HWE, on the site of the pioneer Brown's Station. Wharton, a state congressman and United States senator, lived in HWE from 1805-1838.

By 1850 Nashville was a thriving town of over 10,000, and quickly becoming the economic and political center of Tennessee. In another three years the city would be named the state capitol. In 1859, the opening of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad would help make the city a major avenue of commerce between the north and south. As the city's center grew more crowded, the town's more privileged citizens began to move out along the paths of the new turnpikes that radiated from town. HWE, bounded by two of these turnpikes, Hillsboro on the east and Harding on the west, experienced some of this settlement within its borders. As the city continued to expand, the larger plantations gave way to smaller farms and the country estates of the well-to-do.

In 1854, Reverend Charles Tomes purchased land along the Hillsboro Pike in the northeast corner of HWE. Here he built Glen Oak (NR 11-17-83), an early Gothic Revival dwelling, located at 2012 25th Avenue South. Tomes was the rector of Nashville's Christ Church (NR 11-14-78), Episcopal from 1848 until his death in 1857. After his death, Glen Oak was purchased by Lizinka Campbell Brown and after the Civil War became the home of Edgar Jones, a prominent banker. Jones would subdivide the lands around Glen Oak in 1910. Glen Oak is one of the state's finest Gothic Revival dwellings, and is the oldest extant house in HWE. Glen Oak was listed individually in the National Register of Historic Places in 1983.

Nashville was occupied by Union forces in 1862. Their outer defense line, protecting the city from Confederate attacks, ran directly through HWE, following the area's highest ground. The line crossed Hillsboro Pike just north of Blair Boulevard and, moving west, crossed Natchez Trace in the vicinity of Essex Place. From there it extended to the slope of the hill where Hillside and Overlook Avenues are located, and continued northward to the top of Love Circle (then called Bald Hill), where a small fortification of artillery was stationed. No battles took place within HWE, and subsequent development has eliminated all traces of the defense line. No sections of fortifications or trenches are known to exist.

After the Civil War, Nashville was transformed into a "New South" city. The city's railway system continued to expand, facilitating commercial development. In 1874 Vanderbilt University was founded, the first of several educational institutions that would be established in Nashville in the coming half century. Nashville's population, at 43,350 in 1880, clustered in a four mile area around the city. As the city grew more prosperous and industrialized, the center -- a mix of rich and poor, black and white, home and workplace -- became a less desirable place to live. Commercial establishments had begun to invade even the finest residential areas, and slums ringed the city. Railways, foundries, and mills made the area noisy and grimy. Health conditions, due to poor sanitation and water supplies, were risky.

Appearing first in 1866, mule driven streetcars enabled the city's elite to relocate outside of the inner city -- to South Nashville, across the Cumberland to Edgefield, and North Nashville's Germantown. Suburbs in these areas began to take shape in the 1860s and 70s. Land west and south of the city remained largely undeveloped due in part to a natural gulch, near Union Station, which hindered mule car travel. In the 1880s, however, a viaduct was built over the gulch, and a streetcar line was run out along West End Avenue as far as Vanderbilt University. Residential development followed, clustering around Vanderbilt and Belmont Mansion. By 1887 development was substantial enough to have spread south of Vanderbilt and into the borders of HWE.

Electric streetcar service was introduced to Nashville in February 1888. More powerful and efficient than mule cars, it opened mass transit -- and the suburban frontier -- to the large middle class. Suburban expansion tended toward the west and southwest, and by 1890 this fringe was identified as Nashville's fastest growing sector.

In 1902 the Tennessee Central Railroad cut a path through HWE. This railroad constructed a right-of-way to the west and south of HWE with the track bed sunk below grade through most of this section. The line was eventually purchased by the Illinois Central Line, and operated along the southern section of HWE until it closed in 1968. The railroad bed became the route of I-440 during the 1980s. Development in HWE took about a decade to recover from the depression following the Panic of 1893. By 1905, Nashville's streetcar service was successfully consolidated after years of fragmentation. Better economic times, and reliable transportation, resulted in unprecedented residential growth in HWE. The area's development as a modern day suburb and neighborhood began.

More than one third of HWE's subdivisions were developed in the nine year period between 1905 and 1914. The first of these subdivisions clustered along the western and eastern fringes of HWE, close to the streetcar lines. To the west, these developments followed the line that had been extended along West End Avenue to serve the Richland-West End neighborhood. To the east, the earliest subdivisions clustered around the Hillsboro Pike/Acklen Avenue, where the Belmont streetcar line terminated. As the Belmont and Richland neighborhood filled, the lands comprising HWE became increasingly attractive to developers.

In February 1910, the Nashville Railway and Light Company petitioned for an extension of the Hillsboro streetcar line. This extension brought a streetcar line along HWE's eastern border as far as Blair Boulevard. The extension sparked intense residential development in the eastern section of HWE, resulting in a banner year for HWE: four substantially sized subdivisions -- Sunset Park, Sharondale, West End Heights, and the Edgar Jones Homeplace -- were registered in 1910. These subdivisions were divided into lots measuring from 60' and 200' in width and were marketed by a variety of real estate companies.

A new, aggressive style of real estate promotion came with the age of the electric streetcar. Real estate "syndicates", often financed by those involved in the streetcar companies, adopted new techniques of mass advertising, sales and financing. One such syndicate involved heavily in HWE's development was the Bransford Realty Company. Formed in 1906, Bransford Realty specialized in the buying and opening of subdivisions. They often built grand, opulent homes on the main thoroughfares of these subdivisions (like West End Avenue) and more affordable, middle income cottages on side streets. Bransford advertised heavily in the Nashville papers, promoting the affordability and desirability of the their developments. HWE subdivisions developed by Bransford Realty included West End Avenue Place, Sharondale, West End Heights, Edgar Jones Homeplace, and Westmoreland Place. Apartment buildings began to appear in the district in the 1910s. The first of these was the Harding Court, built in 1914 at the corner of 1914 at the corner of 31st and West End Avenues. Two adjacent buildings, the Wedgewood Apartments and 32nd Avenue Apartments appeared soon after. Today, these buildings are consolidated as the Westboro Apartments. The Vanderbilt-Washington Apartments (DOE 3-27-89), at Portland and 21st Avenues, were built in 1926.

By 1910 other features of a developing neighborhood began to appear around HWE. The neo-classical Belmont Methodist Church was dedicated in 1916 at the corner of Acklen Avenue and Hillsboro Road (outside the boundaries). Another religious building, St. Bernard's Convent and Academy at 2201 21st Avenue S., had been dedicated five years earlier. It's imposing three story brick building was home to the Catholic Sisters of Mercy until recently. The Academy still exists in newer buildings on the grounds. St. Bernard's is the only pre-1941 religious building located within the boundaries of the district.

Hillsboro Village, along Hillsboro Pike at Blakemore, and the shops at the intersection of Hillsboro Pike and Blair Boulevard have served since the 1920s as the commercial centers of HWE. Hillsboro Village included the Belmont and Hillsboro Theatres. Due to alterations and intrusions in the area, neither of these commercial areas are included within the boundaries of the district.

Residential development in the district hit a lull with the outbreak of World War I. After the war, developers turned their attention further west, toward fashionable Belle Meade, which developed after 1910. Development inside HWE revived in the mid-1920s, when the automobile made the area more accessible and less reliant on streetcar transportation.

New subdivision were added at a rate of one a year from 1923 to 1927. These were mostly in HWE's southern sections, well beyond streetcar lines, deep within the district, or in those places where landowners sold off the last remaining large tracts. Most of the houses built during this period were in Tudor Revival cottages in brick and stone.

In 1928, a new school was added to the district. Cavert School, a brick neo-classical edifice at 2500 Fairfax Avenue, was built to help alleviate what had become a serious problem of overcrowding in the city's public school systems -- particularly in the fast growing western districts. With its opening, the Read School, a frame building constructed in 1914 at Blair Blvd. and Hillsboro Pike, was closed. In 1936, Eaken Elementary School was built, with the assistance of the WPA, beside Cavert School in a stripped classical style. Both schools have now been consolidated as Eaken School.

Meanwhile, a series of annexations from 1925 to 1929 brought HWE into the Nashville city limits. This and other annexations increased Nashville's size from 18.2 square miles in 1924 to 26.4 square miles in 1930.

HWE evolved as a stable middle and upper middle class neighborhood for Nashville residents. This diverse middle class, rather than the business and professional elite, lent Hillsboro-West End its character. The overwhelming majority of neighborhood residents were clerks and managers, service station operators, small retailers, government employees, publicity and advertising agents, and office employees. Blue collar workers, including a large number of foremen and mechanics for the L & N Railroad, dwelt alongside bank tellers. It was a neighborhood of commuters, working downtown or in the industrial and commercial ring around the inner city.

The number of occupations represented in the neighborhood ranged widely. Edgar Mittwede lived at 3207 Acklen Avenue in the early 1930s and was involved in the real estate business. Harry Wand, a clerk at Calhoun Jewelry, lived on Sunset Avenue, and Evan Sprott, manager of Bijou Amusements, lived at 2128 Acklen Avenue in the mid-1920s. A large concentration of railroadmen lived on Dudley and Wellington Avenues in the early 1910s. There was also the De Pierri family, headed by Pietro, a dance instructor, living at 2907 Westmoreland Drive, the oldest home on that street.

Entrepreneurs and small businessmen could be found in the neighborhood. Paul Stumb, who lived at 2121 Fairfax Avenue owned Stumb's, a cigar, soda and confectioner's shop downtown. W. L. Scheffer, secretary/treasurer of the Joseph Scheffer Lumber Company (which supplied lumber for many of HWE's homes), lived at 2404 Barton Avenue. Builder H. P. Jacobs subdivided his land along Ashwood Avenue into the Hillsboro Heights subdivision, and sold his house in the land auction.

Prominent Nashville politicians, doctors, and businesspeople could also be found in HWE. John H. Lechleiter lived at 2816 Blair Boulevard until his death in the late 1950s. Lechleiter was an attorney and politician who served for many years on the city council, as well as having been a state legislator, and mayoral and congressional candidate. In the 1940s he was involved in the prosecution of German war criminals in Nuremburg. Also living on Blair, at 2223, was Arthur B. Anderson, attorney general of the Davidson County Criminal Court in the 1910s.

Throughout the 1930s and 1940s HWE could boast some prominent residents. Donald Davidson, the Fugitive poet and iconoclast, wrote his defenses of regional America and reports on the state of Southern literature from his home at 410 Fairfax. His next door neighbor, at-408, Dr. Ernest Goodpasture, was winning international acclaim for his studies of the biological nature of viruses. The Solemn Ol' Judge, George D. Hay, who fifteen years before inaugurated the Saturday Night Barn Dance on WSM, lived at 3303 Orleans.

Beginning with the Great Depression in 1930, and continuing through World War Two, development in Nashville slowed tremendously. Still, some of the last undeveloped tracts of land in HWE were subdivided. Single family houses and duplexes of this period, and following World War Two, were built in Ranch and Minimal Traditional forms.

From the 1950s to the 1980s, the Hillsboro-West End Neighborhood has been involved in a series of disputes to maintain its historical character. In the mid-1950s, Vanderbilt University officials decided that it would need room to grow, and they began to buy houses and lots from its southern border, along Garland and Highland, south to Blakemore and 31st. In 1961 Vanderbilt, along with Scarritt and Peabody Colleges, proposed to the city government a large urban renewal project, and the city sought funds from the federal government, which approved the application the next year. Though eminent domain dwellings in the section of HWE north of Blakemore Avenue were razed to make way for this expansion. Nearly six hundred families and fifty businesses relocated from the project area by the end of 1973.

In the winter of 1974, federal and state highway officials announced plans to proceed with construction of Interstate 440, part of which would run through the neighborhood. Almost immediately, opponents of the project stirred, eventually organizing as Citizens for Better Neighborhoods. The Environmental Impact Statement, which appeared in the summer of 1978, contained the crucial recommendation that I-440 be built below ground level, a recommendation put forward in the departmental design reviews. Other concessions to the neighborhood included the construction of noise barriers along its length, and extensive landscaping. I-440 was completed in 1987 and forms the southern boundary of the historic district.

More decisive for the future of Hillsboro-West End was its possession and renewal by young families, just as the neighborhood's first generation began to sell or die. Manifesting of a movement taking place across urban America, hundreds of the new owners came to HWE seeking a livable, human-scale community. In 1975, the Hillsboro-West End Neighborhood Association was founded to promote and preserve the special identity and character of the neighborhood. In 1986, the Association won one of its most significant victories when it prevented the development of a high-rise hotel and office complex on the former Richland Country Club property. These and other actions have preserved and maintained much of the historic character of Hillsboro-West End as it approaches the 21st Century.

BOUNDARY JUSTIFICATION

The boundary of the district includes properties which are associated with the early residential development of the neighborhood. To the north, the district is bounded by Vanderbilt University, and to the south by the Interstate 440 corridor. On the west, the district is bounded by West End Avenue, minus those properties which have lost their historic context, due to development, or integrity, due to alterations. The eastern edge of the district follows Hillsboro Pike, eliminating properties which have lost their historic context and/or integrity.
