DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The spirit of the antebellum South is expressed by Clifton Place in manner seldom found among old houses today. Located atop gentle rolling terrain overlooking some of the most beautiful farm land imaginable, here is the "great house" in all its old-time elegance. Substantial outbuildings, such as a brick granary and smokehouse, icehouse, servants' quarters and barns, together with traces of the elaborate formal gardens, enable one to reconstruct life as it was once lived.

Built in 1838-1839 by General Gideon J. Pillow, Clifton Place is a good example of Greek Revival architecture as used in Middle Tennessee, although it was built on a grander scale than many homes built of that style and in that period. It has two stories and a cellar, with one story wings on either side. On the first floor are a large entrance hall, two parlors, a dining room, serving room, kitchen and library, with the latter two being connected by a long porch across the back of the house. Four bedrooms and a hall are found on the second floor.

Much of the material of the building is indigenous. The stone for the foundations was quarried on the site, and the brick was kilned on the place. For interior doors and trim, wild cherry was cut from the nearby forests, as were the hand-hewn pine timbers for structural purposes. The steps, column bases and porch floors are of stone, while the column shafts, caps and cornices are of wood. The roof of the house is of tin and those of the outhouses of shakes. Cast iron balustrades frame the second floor under the entrance portico. The facades and gable treatments with the stone buttress terminus of the cornice run the full length of the front and rear elevations. Twin chimneys are tied together with a brick parapet above the roof ridge line. The imposing, graceful entrance consists of a projecting portico two stories high, with four Ionic columns supporting a pediment of the same order. At the second floor level a wood porch projects and is supported by the columns and enclosed by a cast iron rail between the columns.

At the rear of the house a wide walk led to the garden gate. The garden plot was divided into three separate units. The first was planted with boxwoods, magnolias, laurel, spruce and cedar trees. The second garden was given over to flowers and the third to vegetables. At the end of the third garden was a greenhouse with glassed conservatory. Only traces now remain of these once beautiful gardens.

After the death of General and Mrs. Pillow, the house passed to a son-in-law, Melville Williams, and later to Colonel J. W. S. Ridley. It still belongs to Ridley descendants who until very recent years occupied the house, using the original furniture, mirrors, portraits and silver. It is now used as rental property and shows the need for much repair and maintenance to restore it to its former place as one of the finest houses in Middle Tennessee.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The significance of Clifton Place is the result of a combination of factors any one of which would make it important and worthy of preservation. As an example of the prosperous plantation society of the South in the first half of the nineteenth century, Clifton Place is unsurpassed and seldom equalled. The elegant house, the dwellings for the house servants and the farm hands, the granary and smokehouse, the icehouse and the barns and stables, overlook fields, lush meadows, green pastures and wooded hills. The pattern of self-sustaining agrarian life is certainly well-exemplified at Clifton Place. The excellent example of Greek Revival architecture used in the design and construction of Clifton Place makes it significant in this respect also. The contractor was Nathan Vaught, a very talented man who built many of the fine residences and other buildings in Maury County.

Gideon Pillow, father of General Gideon J. Pillow settled in Maury County in 1809 or 1810. He became a large landholder and each of his three sons built homes nearby. Like their neighbors, the Polks, the Pillows were lavish builders.

Gideon J. Pillow graduated from the University of Nashville in 1827 and began the practice of law in Columbia. He was very successful in both his law practice and his farming operations. Pillow never held public office, although he was a skilled manipulator in state politics. In 1844 he was a delegate in the Democratic Convention, and was instrumental in the nomination of his friend, James K. Polk, also of Maury County, for the presidency. Pillow was a controversial figure, his personality being such as to cause people to either dislike him intensely or show great loyalty and friendship toward him. Many considered him to be an egotist with an inflated sense of his importance.

Pillow's great claim to fame rests on his career as a soldier, also a controversial subject. Although his military experience was limited, President Polk in 1846 appointed him a brigadier-general in the war with Mexico. He was twice wounded during the war. When the Civil War began, he was made a brigadier-general in the Confederate Army. He fought at the Battle of Belmont, Missouri, in November, 1861 and in the same winter was second in command at Fort Donelson. His career in the Confederate Army was often a subject of controversy and criticism.

8. Significance (cont.)

After the war, Pillow practiced law in Memphis with former Governor Isham G. Harris. His fortune was largely depleted by the war and he died in modest circumstances on October 8, 1878, and is buried in Elmwood Cemetery, Memphis.
