Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Forest Park is a large suburban residential park of approximately 230 acres located 2 miles from downtown Birmingham. It occupies a slope near the crest of Red Mountain and the whole is designed on broad, sweeping lines with the streets and sidewalks following the natural contour of the mountain.

Homes in the district occupy large lots on steeply sloping terrain. Most of the homes were designed by accomplished architects for individual owners, rather than as commercially developed structures. Ninety (90%) percent of the structures are considered to contribute to the district and of the 90%, 75% are considered architecturally significant. Georgian and Federal Revival adaptations comprise a large percentage of the houses in Forest Park. These two story brick structures are usually four or five bays wide and are adorned with porticos. Most have delicate fan and side lights. The typical English Tudor is characterized by a first story of either brick or rock and second story of stucco with half-timber trim. There are stucco gables, hipped or mansard roof, and in many cases, porches with natural rock columns. Spanish and Mediterranean houses are scattered throughout. They are mostly masonry constructed with a stucco exterior, many with terra cotta roof, Moorish columns, wrought iron trim and arched windows. The California Bungalow and simpler bungalow styles are evident in both one and two story structures.

Perhaps the most interesting group of houses to be built in Forest Park are the "Simplicity Houses." These structures (appearing primarily on Tenth Avenue and Forty-third Place), were always built at the rear of huge lots with the intention that they be used later as servants quarters when the main house was built. During the construction of the main house, the family lived in the "Simplicity House". They are characterized by one or two bedrooms, a living room, kitchen and bath and invariably were of frame construction. In many cases the "Great House" was never built, because of the depression.

Forest Park is separated from Redmont (a later development) by a strip of land fronting over three thousand feet on the north side of Altamont Road on the crest of Red Mountain. This parkway completed the park-styled development when the City of Birmingham purchased it as the city's first mountain park in 1927. Known as the Altamont Parkway today, this property runs for three-fourths mile, affording a most commanding view of Birmingham and Jones Valley below.

On the west, the Forest Park Historical District is bounded by Highland Park Golf Course and 38th Street which separates the district from that of Highland.

The northern boundary is Clairmont Avenue with three blocks of Overlook Road. Proceeding east, the Historical District ends abruptly past the 4600 block of Clairmont Avenue where new construction begins, thus offering a drastic contrast to the fifty year old structures of the historic area.

The eastern boundary is Linwood Road until it reaches Landale. There it takes in 8 houses on Landale and one on Rockford which is one block south of Landale. The structure on Rockford (now a residence) was originally an outbuilding for 973 Linwood Road. It was once used as a carriage house. The entire street of Rockford Road (with the exception of that house) is new construction.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Forest Park is one of Alabama's best examples of an early 20th century, suburban residential park. It is noted not only for its plan, but also for the consistently high quality of the individual houses and its association with some of Birmingham's leading citizens. The earliest portion of the park was laid out by Samuel Parsons, a noted landscape architect of the period, while many of the houses were designed by the city's most noted architects. Stylistically, the majority of the houses are good examples of the revival styles of the early 20th-century, with Georgian, Tudor and Adamesque predominating. A sizable percentage, however, reflect the influence of Craftsman design. Among the architects working in the district were William Weston, T.U. Walters, the firm of Miller, Martin and Lewis, S. Scott Joy, Charles McCauley and George P. Turner.

Robert Jemson, one of the pioneer developers in the young city of Birmingham, was responsible for the development. He was determined that in Forest Park, he would disturb the natural beauty of the mountainside as little as possible. To that end, he engaged the services of Samuel Parsons, a leading landscape architect from New York, to plan the original section -- Mountain Terrace. Parsons' plan followed the natural curves and undulations of the mountainside and augmented the natural foliage with additional plantings of linden trees. Although Parsons only laid out the Mountain Terrace section (see green shading on map), his plan was extended throughout Forest Park as it developed.

After 1906, development of the area proceeded rapidly and by the mid-twenties, it was considered to be one of the most prestigious residential sections of the city and was widely advertised as "the cleanest and least smokey district" of greater Birmingham and to have "water as pure as to be found anywhere." The majority of the structures were completed prior to 1928. After the depression the area began to decline, however, in recent years it has regained its status as one of the city's most desirable residential areas.
