Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

7. Description

The fire hall is a single story structure built of red brick, bricks which were made on the Vermilion Range. The front openings are all rounded arches, with a large gate, two smaller doors and three window bays. The large door has a counterpart in the rear to facilitate through movement. Beneath the driveway there is a large cistern used for storing water in the event of the failure of the city water supply during an emergency. The rest of the structure is composed of offices and meeting rooms which are used infrequently.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Fire Hall represents the great danger that fire posed to the early iron mining communities with their crowded city lots, woodframe buildings, and lack of suitable water systems to support heavily pressurized equipment. The investment in the fire hall and the volunteer nature of the firefighters' serviceworked together to make the community aware of the fire hazard and to avoid it. The frequent destruction of various Range towns such as Virginia and Chisholm reinforced such attitudes and community spirit. The fire hall is the oldest community firehall on the Iron Range.

Although originally built to be only a fire hall, the building has, since construction, been used for various other municipal purposes, including meeting rooms, record storage, and polling place.
