DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The E. A. Calling House, built ca. 1907, is located directly west of Ehmen's Park in Gothenburg, Nebraska (1970 pop. 3,158). The house occupies two lots in a residential neighborhood and has a variety of shrubberies and trees on its well-tended grounds.

A modified rectangle, this small-scaled Queen Anne residence is of frame construction above a concrete block foundation. The core of the house and an extension on the north (see photo 1) are a story and a half and have gambrel roofs. On the south (see photos 2 and 3) is a two-story extension with a gabled roof. All roof sections are clad with cedar shingles.

A shed-roofed porch spanned the rear; this part has been clapboarded and incorporated into the kitchen (see photo 4). A gable-roofed portico with a flared covering and Ionic colonnettes shelters a short flight of steps on the northeast corner. Wrapping around portions of the east and south is a bowed porch, also with Ionic colonnettes.

A conical-roofed turret emerges on the southeast corner, and projecting from the gabled extension on the south is an oriel sheltered by a small shed roof. Imbrication appears in the upper level of each facade (see photos 1, 2, 3, and 4). Windows are in a variety of shapes and arrangements, ranging from the three-part window piercing the oriel to diminutive fanlights in the attic level. No significant fenestral changes have occured, excepting the removal of leaded glass and the installation of plate glass in the second-level window of the front facade.

Two staircases connect the first and second levels of the Calling House -- an open staircase past the main entrance, featuring a squat Ionic column as a newel post (see photo 5); and an enclosed staircase linking the kitchen with the rear of the second-floor hall. There is a generous use of leaded glass in many windows throughout the house (see photos 5, 6 and 7), and the interior woodwork is treated with delicate Neo-Adamesque forms. Three sets of sliding doors connect the downstairs rooms. The set between the living and sitting rooms is cut with yellow pine to match woodwork of the former and with light oak to match woodwork of the latter.

The second level contains a hall with a bedroom to either side and a sitting room at the front (see photo 7). The only interior alteration, aside from the kitchen expansion, has been the removal of one upstairs partition wall.

Southwest of the Calling House is a frame garage constructed in 1952. Its scale and construction material minimize its intrusive effect (see photo 3).

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Ernest A. Calling house is architecturally significant to the community of Gothenburg as a fine and well-preserved vernacular Queen Anne residence. In its location in South-central Nebraska, the house clearly illustrates the retention Queen Anne forms and elements enjoyed in Plains architecture past the turn of the century.

Ernest A. Calling (ne Carlson), for whom the house was built, was born in Klippin, Sweden, in 1870. He immigrated to the United States in 1889, initially settling in Bloomington, Illinois, but shortly afterward moving to the vicinity of Gothenburg, Nebraska, which had a sizeable Swedish population. Chronologically, Calling was engaged in ranching, business, local government, and land development. Upon his death in 1945, a newspaper in the area judged him "a pioneer resident of Gothenburg and one of its most prominent businessmen" (The Cozad Local, March 23, 1945, p. 1).

Gothenburg was incorporated in 1885 -- the name originally being Guttenburg, named in honor of an early resident's birthplace in Sweden, but altered later by a postmaster of German descent (The Early History of Gothenburg p. 16). Many civic improvements had been accomplished by 1906, the approximate year Ernest Calling contracted L. J. Anderson, a local builder, to construct a dwelling for him immediately west of Ehmen's Park in a residential neighborhood.

Little is known of L. J. Anderson. There are several other residences in Gothenburg that appear to have been built by him. The Calling House, however, possesses the most pleasing design and is in the best preserved state. Alterations have been limited to the incorporation of a rear porch into the kitchen and the modification of a window on the principal facade. Otherwise, the house significantly retains its early-20th-century appearance.

This vernacular house, probably adapted from a builder's guide, is smaller than the typical Queen Anne residence. Nevertheless, it is permeated by the eclectic spirit indicative of the style. Built when the Queen Anne was much out of favor, both the interior and exterior exhibit Neo-classical forms which were becoming manifest in American architecture in the early 1900s. The Calling House is characterized by its irregular massing, multiplicity of roof shapes, variety of windows, and textural flourishes. The interior features a good amount of woodwork in an exemplary condition.
