Describe present and historic physical appearance:

Summary

Located at 206 Erwin Street in Des Arc, the American Legion Hut is a rectangular-plan, single-story log structure constructed in 1934 in the style known as "WPA Rustic."

Elaboration

Constructed in 1934, the American Legion Hut at 206 Erwin Street in Des Arc is a rectangular-plan, single-story community hall built of saddle-notched round logs on brick piers and covered by a composition-shingled, side-gable roof. The peeled logs are natural in color except of the sawn ends, which are painted white. As this method of log construction is ill fitting, copious quantities of white cement mortar is used for chinking. Exterior window and door trim is painted white, and unpainted, coursed wood shingles of indeterminate age are utilized in the two gable ends.

The front, or southern, elevation is dominated by a massive exterior brick chimney with "weeping" mortar joints in the center of the symmetrical facade. To either side of the chimney, respectively, is a small wood-frame, nine-pane casement window, a single-leaf entrance, another nine-pane casement window, and a large wood-frame, twelve-over-twelve double-hung window. Both entrances are shielded by a small projecting gable roof supported by two triangular knee brackets. A nonhistoric shed-roof begins at the western entrance, which has been converted for handicapped accessibility, below the gable roof and wraps around to the western elevation. This shed roof is supported by simple diagonal braces and covers a new concrete sidewalk.

A projecting log bay defines the center of the western elevation and is fenestrated with a twelve-over-twelve window. The main wall to either side of this bay contains a nine-pane casement window.

The rear, or northern, elevation is partially obscured by a nonhistoric board-and-batten shed-roof addition on the western end and an older drop-sided, gable-roof addition at the eastern end. The center of the elevation, however, presents another projecting log bay and twelve-over-twelve window via a shed-roof extension of the side gable.

The eastern elevation is identical to its western counterpart except that the center bay retains its original shed roof.

Featuring exposed log interior walls and an impressive brick fireplace, the interior is virtually unchanged with the exception of the aforementioned additions.

Summary

The American Legion Hut is locally significant under Criterion C as the best example in Des Arc of the Depression-era style known as "WPA Rustic."

Elaboration

The settlement at Des Arc, located on the White River in northern Prairie County, dates to before the Civil War. According to Dallas T. Herndon's, Annals of Arkansas, the town was formally laid out around 1850 by the major landowner of the area, George C. Watkins, who was later Chief Justice of the Arkansas Supreme Court (1852-54). The town was incorporated on December 28, 1854 and in 1875 gained the county seat of Prairie County. By the twentieth century the river port's transportation capabilities were enhanced by a branch line of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific railroad.

When the American Legion Hut was constructed in 1934, Des Arc contained one state and one national bank, a foundry and machine shop, newspapers, a number of sawmills and woodworking concerns, stores, public schools, and other such establishments common to a vibrant town. An idea concerning the population at the time can be garnered from the 1920 census, 1,307, and the 1940 census, 1,410.

Although it is not specifically mentioned in the report, A Review of Work Relief Activities In Arkansas, April 1st, 1934 to July 1st, 1935, the American Legion Hut in Des Arc was perhaps counted as part of 113 "combination community recreation halls" constructed by the Works Progress Administration during those years. According to information submitted by Bonnie Rieke, the American Legion Hut was constructed by both volunteers and WPA-paid local workers. The logs for the structure were purchased by Will Johnson and cut from the King property by Josh Stanley. After being floated down the White River for nine miles, the logs were then hewn or peeled on site by Calvin Vance Hall and his son. Glen Pay fitted the logs into their present form, and Bruce Garth constructed the fireplace. This construction was supervised by Charlie Johnson. The American Legion utilized the building exclusively until 1983 when the Women's Auxiliary Veterans of Foreign Wars, Moore Johnson Post, obtained the lease. Currently used as a community building, the American Legion Hut provides a meeting place for a variety of local organizations.

The American Legion Hut is locally significant under Criterion C as the best example in Des Arc of the style commonly known as "Rustic" or "WPA Rustic." In Depression-era Arkansas, this style was considered the latest trend in architecture, and The WPA Guide to 1930s Arkansas referred to these structures as "forest houses" and noted ". . . the impression given is one of complete solidity and honesty." The American Legion Hut exemplifies the essence of the "Rustic" style and is somewhat unusual by virtue of its symmetrical plan with the primary emphasis bestowed upon the exterior chimney on the front elevation.
