Summary Paragraph

Temple Beth Israel, a Modernist style synagogue, is located at 39 Killingly Drive in Danielson, Town of Killingly, Windham County, Connecticut. The rectangular, two-story, fieldstone- and wood-faced building measures 40 feet wide and 75 feet long, and is set back from the adjacent streets, with the main entrance facing west. The building is surrounded by open space, including a parking lot, and retains its historic integrity. The surrounding neighborhood is primarily residential, and most of the single family homes on the surrounding streets were built in the 1950s and later. Danielson's downtown center is approximately four to five blocks west of the site.

Narrative Description

Exterior

Temple Beth Israel is a rectangular shaped, two-story building with a gabled roof (Photograph 1). The Temple has a concrete foundation and concrete walls, which are faced with local fieldstone on the exterior. Large banks of windows are located on the north and south elevations of the temple, with wood panels separating the windows at the juncture of the two floors (Photographs 2 and 3). The larger windows are fixed but the smaller windows can be opened. Much of the façade on the western elevation consists of large windows as well, with an oversized and prominent Star of David incorporated into the glass design at the peak of the gable (Photograph 4). A marble panel of the Ten Commandments is located on the outside wall of the patio on the facade, facing the parking lot (Photograph 5). The exterior of the east elevation of the building alternates between stone and vertical wood siding, and has two tall, narrow windows flanking the woodwork (Photograph 6). The gabled roof has wide overhanging eaves with exposed rafters and is covered with asphalt shingles. A large fieldstone-faced entry on the west side of the building includes steps leading up from the street level as well as the lower basement-level patio, and a patio deck outside the main entry doors (Photograph 1). The lower level patio, accessed via the double basement doors, includes a retaining wall (Photograph 7). Alterations to the exterior are visible on the south side of the building, where two larger picture windows were replaced along with the basement entry doors, and the stonework was redone. There is a slight variation in color and treatment between the two episodes of stonework (Photograph 8).

Interior

There are two floors within the Temple. The basement level was the first to be built, in 1951, and until 1961 when the main or upper floor was completed, served as space for all functions of the Temple. The basement contains a vestry on the west end with a stone fireplace and sitting area (Photograph 9). The southern side of the vestry includes the stairwell connecting the basement to the main floor, with storage beneath the stairway, and men's and women's bathrooms (Photograph 10). The northern side of the vestry contains the original boiler room and the kitchen. A larger storage room was built as an addition to the west side of the basement; its ceiling is under the raised stone patio that leads to the main floor entry, above, and there is a service door allowing entry to the storage area under the exterior steps. The majority of the basement level consists of a large social room, which currently is set up with long tables and chairs (Photographs 11 and 12). An accordion style divider can be extended from the walls to divide the vestry from the social room. There is a curtained performance stage at the eastern end of the social room that includes a piano (Photograph 13). The walls of the basement level are covered with dark brown wood paneling. Several large built-in cabinets are located on either side of the stone fireplace and within the social room (Photograph 14). The floor is laid with linoleum tile. There are banks of windows at the top of the basement walls, and double wooden doors leading out to the patio on the south side of the building. Small, rectangular fluorescent light fixtures are spaced at intervals throughout the social room and longer fluorescent fixtures hang from the ceiling in the vestry and sitting area.

The main, or upper, floor contains the sanctuary. Although the shell of the upper floor was completed by 1955, the sanctuary was not finished until 1961. The main entrance to the Temple is at the western side of the hall, accessed by a set of stone steps from the parking area.

The western end of the sanctuary includes the memorial foyer (Photograph 15). On the stone-faced walls are several memorial plaques, including one dated 1966 that is filled with names of deceased congregants and family members, and another similar plaque partially filled and with space for additional names to be added (Photograph 16). A small plaque commemorates the 6,000,000 Jews killed during the Holocaust. Near the stairway on the southern side of the foyer are two additional plaques (Photograph 17). One dates to 1960 and is titled "Bimha Donated in Memory of Our Loved Ones" and lists sixteen lines of individual and paired donors. The second dates to 1975 and commemorates the 25th Anniversary of the Temple, listing eighteen lines of donors. Several of the same donors are listed on both plaques, attesting to the longevity of the congregation. A large wooden coat and tallis (or prayer shawl) rack and attached cabinet has been built around the base of the chimney that continues from the basement to the roof (Photograph 18). The remainder of the internal chimney stack is faced with wood paneling.

The main sanctuary comprises the majority of the upper floor. It is an open space with individual, moveable chairs aligned in rows on either side of a main aisle (Photographs 19 and 20). The bimah (or raised platform, variously spelled bimha, bima or bema) is at the eastern end of the sanctuary (Photograph 21). It is accessed by three short steps on the left and right sides and two taller steps in the center. There is a Holy Ark, containing Torah scrolls, at the rear center of the bimah, which is covered with a dark blue curtain and is traditionally placed at the east of the building to face Jerusalem. The Hebrew lettering on the top of the curtain translates roughly to "Open up the Gates of Righteousness." A large table for reading the Torah is situated directly in front of the Ark, and a smaller lectern is located to the left of the Ark when facing the bimah. Walls surrounding the bimah create enclosed space behind it on either side, and are accessed by narrow doorways that blend into the walls (Photograph 22). Four parallel vertical strips of multi-colored stained glass are located at the junction of the walls on both sides of the bimah (Photograph 23). Additional decorative elements on these walls include two slate tablets with gold Hebrew lettering of the Ten Commandments near the lectern, a seven-branched electric candelabrum on the facing wall, and two recessed images depicting the Tree of Life on either side of the Ark. An eternal light hangs from the ceiling in front of the Ark, and is crafted of multi-colored stained glass, lead and bronze, in a Modernist style (Photograph 24). Additional cylindrical lights (wide and flat within the main sanctuary and long and narrow nearer the foyer) with alternating candelabra and Stars of David hang from the rafters, also designed in a Modernist style (Photographs 25 and 26). The phrase "Know Before Whom You Stand" in large Hebrew letters adorns the eastern wall of the sanctuary. Presently, there are four contemporary-styled wooden armchairs and the flags of the United States and Israel at the back of the bimah.

The upper floor of the Temple contains a combination of glass, wood, and stone interior treatments. The eastern and western ends and corners of the room have stone-faced walls, the main area is enclosed almost completely by large floor to ceiling windows, and the floors and open raftered ceiling with exposed beams are constructed of wood. All of the wood, regardless of its type, has been stained a matching warm, medium-brown walnut color. Wall to wall carpeting covers the floor of the foyer, the aisle down the center of the sanctuary, and the bimah.

The Temple has had various upgrades, including the installation of new heating systems and a chair lift for the interior stairs. In the late 1950s, prior to completing the sanctuary, structural reinforcements were installed in both the basement and upper levels, as evidenced by the steel columns near the walls that are bolted to the rafters. The southern basement façade also was altered to eliminate two large picture windows to the east of the doorway. The double wood paneled doors leading from the patio to the basement were replaced in 2009.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance, applicable criteria, justification for the period of significance, and any applicable criteria considerations.)

Temple Beth Israel is significant for both its historical and architectural value, under Criteria A and C, respectively, at the State level of significance. Properties owned by religious institutions or used for religious purposes are usually not considered eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places. However, Temple Beth Israel is a remarkably well-preserved example of a Modern Movement religious building. It was designed by two Jewish architects who were active in the Boston, Massachusetts area, which was an important center of Modern design in the 1950s. Temple Beth Israel was among the first synagogues in Connecticut designed in a wholly Modernist style, by graduates of two of the most prestigious art and design programs in the nation and who were studying, working alongside, and influenced by some of the most famous names in architecture of their generation. This building derives much of its significance from this architectural or artistic distinction. It is also significant because it was built largely by survivors of the Holocaust, who, while retaining their ethnic identity, decided on a distinctly American building for their place of worship. The first year of the period of significance is 1951, when the building was designed, ground was broken for the construction, and the basement level was completed, giving the congregants space to worship until 1961 when the main floor and sanctuary were completed. The last year of the period of significance is 1963, in keeping with the 50-year threshold for National Register of Historic Places properties.

Narrative Statement of Significance (Provide at least one paragraph for each area of significance.)

Temple Beth Israel owes its significance to several important factors. It is a religious building, used for decades by a mixed Orthodox and Conservative Jewish congregation. Both its design and heritage reflect the experiences of its members, most specifically the Holocaust of World War II. And yet, despite the fact that many of its members had recently emigrated from the “Old World” of Eastern Europe, the Temple came to be designed by two American Jews working at the height of the country’s Modernist movement. They created a building for the congregation that represented the newest trend in quintessentially American architecture.

Religion and Ethnic Heritage¹

Despite their different backgrounds, the common bond between the congregants of Temple Beth Israel was religion. The Danielson area traditionally was Yankee territory, originally home to hard-working Christian settlers, first Puritans and later Congregationalists, who had come to this “quiet” corner of Connecticut to farm and pursue industry, and who had as their core a strong sense of hard work, thrift, community and civic duty. The first Jewish families did not move to the area until the 1920s. They came from other parts of New England, but were lured to Danielson by the promise of land and the ability to start anew. Some became poultry farmers, a popular livelihood in the region; others worked in or owned commercial businesses. All told, there were only nine Jewish families in the Danielson area by ca. 1945, but they had formed a strong community, both among themselves and among the local residents. Some, including Nathan Blumenthal and Sol Baker, became local leaders, serving as board members for civic groups and earning the respect of their non-Jewish neighbors. The Temple Beth Israel history notes:

They formed the Danielson Jewish Community Club. This group held meetings, services and rituals in the Blumenthal home and the home of Sol Baker, a local business executive. Bar Mitzvahs were held at members’ homes. For high holidays the Community Club would rent different buildings in town including the Elks and the American Legion hall. By virtue of its small size, the Jewish community naturally avoided the sectarian differences that sometimes confounded their metropolitan counterparts. The handful of Danielson Jews could not afford the luxury of disagreements about how to live as Jews.

After World War II and the Holocaust, the Danielson area received a sizeable influx of new Jewish families, most of them European refugees and many of them fresh from displaced persons camps established after the war. The impetus to resettle Holocaust survivors in Eastern Connecticut came in no small part from the Jewish Agricultural Society, a philanthropic organization that had been founded as the Baron de Hirsch Fund. It was incorporated to assist recently arrived Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe through financial aid and held as one of its main goals the resettlement of Jews on farmland, known as the "Back to the Land" movement. Benjamin Miller, the regional agent for the Jewish Agricultural Society, helped more than forty Jewish families relocate to the Danielson area between 1948-1952, providing financial assistance as well as access to inexpensive farmland, where they were encouraged to begin new chapters of their lives as rural farmers.

The Holocaust survivors were a varied group of Jews. Coming from disparate parts of Europe and from widely divergent backgrounds, they ran the gamut in terms of their levels of wealth, education, trades, political leanings, and degrees of religious observance. They spoke Yiddish and often little English. These "Old World" Jews likely were as much of a shock to the Americanized Jews as the other way around. However, these differences notwithstanding, the new arrivals were welcomed and helped in their adjustment to American life by the now established Jewish community. There were loans, gifts, advice, and a general embracing of these impoverished immigrants. Blumenthal's hardware store offered goods to newcomers on the barter system, the currency of choice being eggs and chickens.

With the Jewish population in the Danielson area now reaching nearly fifty families, too many people to fit into living rooms and rented spaces of the past, it was time to begin considering building a permanent synagogue. Although the Danielson Jews worshipped under different traditions, with some Conservative and others Orthodox, there was no chance that the community could afford more than one new facility, and so out of necessity the group pulled together and forged ahead with plans to create a single synagogue that would serve the entire local Jewish population. Despite the knowledge that cost would be a significant obstacle, the Danielson Jewish community set to the task of planning for a new synagogue. Committees were formed to explore fundraising options, potential building sites, and the possible acquisition of older structures that could be renovated. Ultimately, the group decided to purchase land at the intersection of Killingly Drive and Corrine Street, which at that time was on the outskirts of town and not yet developed, to build a new synagogue. Congregation member Mary Riseman's son William Riseman designed the building (Photograph 27) and the Riseman family donated the fieldstone for the building from a quarry on their farm.

Although the Danielson Jewish community hailed from a wide range of backgrounds and homelands, what united them, beyond their religion, was their ethnic heritage. Nearly everyone in the group spoke Yiddish, the native language of their ancestors for generations. Despite their different geographical backgrounds, most were accustomed to living and working in tightly knit enclaves of Jewish families, who relied on each other for much of their daily needs and spiritual support. Judaism also has at its core a strong tradition of helping those in need, particularly other Jews, but in Danielson, there also was a history of Jews helping non-Jews as well. The local Jewish families had already won the respect of their Yankee neighbors, enmeshing themselves in the local community and participating in and raising funds for needed local organizations. So when it was time to fund their own project, the Temple Beth Israel building, the Jewish community was well placed to both organize themselves into a viable congregation who could come together to raise money, but also to tap into their non-Jewish neighborhood contacts to assist with the project.

As expected, raising the money needed for the project was a significant challenge. The finance committee was headed by Sol Baker, with assistance from Saul Silverstein, who was the president of the Rogers Corporation, and Nathan Blumenthal, who ran the local hardware store. Their first fundraising drive was among the congregation's membership, and about $3000 was raised this way. That was enough to purchase the land, for $1500, and begin the construction. The groundbreaking ceremony took place on July 22, 1951 and included an outdoor ceremony with speakers addressing the assembled crowd from a makeshift dais on a truck bed decorated with blue and white banners and featuring the flags of both the United States and Israel (Photographs 28 and 29). Among themselves, the congregation collected an additional $3000 that summer to fund the cost of the foundation, but they still were significantly short of their total goal. Their only choice was to approach their Danielson and Killingly neighbors for help.

The finance committee got to work, enlisting the help of their friends and coworkers in the larger area. The Windham County Transcript, the Danielson weekly newspaper, published a plea from its owner and editor, Bill Herklots, entitled "Let's Return the Compliment!" asking the local residents to help with the fundraising drive. He wrote:

As we have remarked in the past, it has been our experience that the Jewish people have never been found lacking when asked to contribute to drives for religious and fraternal organizations not their own. Those not of their faith should now in return give them needed support...in their endeavor to have a place where they can bring up their children in...the religion of their forefathers.²

The responses of the local community toward the Temple Beth Israel fundraising requests were very positive. Ministers and priests took up the cause, urging their members to contribute, which they did. Some more affluent residents gave more money: one local businessman wrote a check for $1000 and another local farmer and first selectman of the neighboring Town of Brooklyn donated a calf to be auctioned and the proceeds donated to the Temple. Letters then were sent to local businesses and industrial firms, who also contributed money.

Despite the larger donations, which understandably made more of an impression in the news, what was truly remarkable was the fact that the majority of the fundraising occurred by very small increments of money. The Windham County Transcript listed the individuals who contributed to the fund, many giving as little as $1, $2, $5 or $10, but all who donated funds were included in the published tally. Elsie Fetterman, the first Temple Beth Israel Sisterhood president, recalls that every woman in the group was assigned a particular fundraising activity to chair. Proceeds from activities as varied as bake sales, barbeques, rummage sales, card table advertisements, cookbook sales, and the like were carefully recorded in the financial ledger books and used toward the overall building fund.³

After the ground breaking for the synagogue in the summer of 1951, construction of the foundation and lower floor progressed rapidly. The contractor hired was the Ventura Construction Company, operated by local resident Joe Ventura of Danielson, with congregation members contributing materials and expertise as necessary. Blumenthal's hardware supplied the building and plumbing hardware at cost, and congregant Ben Goldstein donated his services as a plumber.⁴ Sol Baker arranged to have labor donated to quarry rock from the Riseman's farm.⁵ Photographs (30-34) show that the concrete floor and concrete walls went up quickly, and the roof of the basement was completed in the fall, in time for the first High Holy Days to be celebrated in the building in early October.

During the first years that the congregation used the unfinished synagogue, while continually striving for additional funds to complete the building, the Temple Beth Israel community began to coalesce. The pre-war residents became some of the first leaders, with local businessman Sol Baker elected as the first president and Elsie Fetterman, who with her husband Irving had purchased the first plot of land for the synagogue, was elected by the women to lead a new Sisterhood. The group started a Hebrew school and a youth group. All of the activities of the Temple continued to be held in the basement while the building remained incomplete.

By 1955, the second floor of the Temple and the majority of the exterior finally had been completed (Photograph 35), and a small group of congregants had signed a $15,000 mortgage in order to raise the remaining funds to finish the building.⁶ However, the interior sanctuary had yet to be designed or constructed; thus moving the congregation into its final stage of fundraising. Many members contributed money to design and create the fittings for the sanctuary, including the bimah, the Holy Ark, and other crucial elements needed. As will be detailed below, the sanctuary was designed by Maurice N. Finegold, who had been contracted by the congregation in 1958. Over the course of several years the interior design and construction continued.⁷ The formal dedication of the completed Temple Beth Israel took place on June 5, 1961, with 250 people in attendance.

Despite the significant challenges in building Temple Beth Israel, including periods of acrimony among the congregation as the costs rose and the construction stalled, the Jewish community of Danielson ultimately banded together, drawing on its shared religion, interdependence between residents and families, and ethnic heritage, to overcome the obstacles in completing the Temple. The Temple was active for several decades, although membership dwindled in the 1980s through the end of the twentieth century. In 2009, after six years of merging with the Sons of Zion Synagogue in Putnam, Connecticut (the group was known collectively as Congregation B'nai Shalom), the Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society was incorporated by a group of descendants of the original founders, with its mission to own and maintain the Temple Beth Israel building and to establish a community center in Danielson.

Architecture

The impetus to build a synagogue for the Danielson area Jewish community stemmed from the congregation itself, who had decided their numbers had increased enough to warrant a facility of their own. When it came time to design the new building, in ca. 1950, they were fortunate that one of their members, Mary Riseman, had a son who could do the job. William Riseman (1911-1982) was a 1933 graduate of Yale's School of Art, specializing in painting.⁸ By age 25 he held seven first prize medals awarded by the Beaux Arts Institute of Design of New York for excellence in murals.⁹ After graduation, he worked as a painter for the Treasury Department's Section of Painting and Sculpture (later known as The Section of Fine Arts), which was established in 1934 and operated until 1942. Two murals he painted for the U.S. Post Office in Lynn, Massachusetts and completed in 1936 (entitled "Colonial and Contemporary Civic Culture" and "Early and Modern Industries of Lynn") have been designated a National Historic Monument.¹⁰ During the mid-1930s the Riseman family, who were poultry dealers, had moved from Winthrop, Massachusetts to Brooklyn, Connecticut, located just west of Danielson, and established a chicken farm there. William Riseman lived with or near his family in Brooklyn during the 1930s and through the mid-1940s, after which he moved to Wrentham, Massachusetts.¹¹

By the mid-1930s, Riseman had established an interior decorating business in Boston with Alexander Lercari (known as Riseman & Lercari), and appears to have been commuting from Brooklyn.¹² His earliest commissions were to paint interiors of existing buildings or those undergoing remodeling, particularly theaters, restaurants, lounges, and other public venues. In 1936 Riseman created the eponymously named William Riseman Associates, who billed themselves over time as interior decorators, theater decorators, and theater architects. The company garnered a number of contracts to completely renovate and redecorate the interiors of older theaters in order to convert them into modern movie houses. By the late 1940s, multi-page articles in national architectural magazines described that the firm had completed major theater renovation projects in Wareham, Fall River, several locations in Boston, Massachusetts, and Hartford and Thompsonville, Connecticut.¹³ The firm continued to work locally in the Northeast on various other painting and theater remodeling projects during the 1940s as well.¹⁴

As the 1940s drew to a close, the Danielson Jewish community was deciding to move forward with constructing a new synagogue. Although not a particularly religious man, William Riseman was moved by the plight of the congregation's Holocaust survivors and wanted to make a contribution on their behalf.¹⁵ He took an interest in the project and agreed to donate his services to design the building, and his mother Mary offered free fieldstone from the quarry on the family farm in Brooklyn to be used in the construction. After Mary Riseman died in December 1950, William Riseman agreed to finish the design free of charge in her memory.¹⁶ Although William Riseman was by now an accomplished artist, interior designer, and building renovator, it appears that he had not yet designed any new buildings, and although he had completed some Jewish-themed artwork, he had certainly never designed an entire synagogue from the ground up. With little first-hand experience in such matters, but with a vacant parcel of land and no particular design restrictions, Riseman had a clean slate to create a building that reflected both the current trends but paid homage to this special community.

As part of his preparations, Riseman no doubt studied historic and contemporary synagogue examples for reference, but rather than replicate the style of other synagogues in Connecticut and the Northeast, which during the early decades of the twentieth century tended to mimic traditional designs and/or hew to architectural styles of past eras,¹⁷ he embraced the Modernist architectural movement that was becoming increasingly popular in Boston at the time. Harvard University's architecture and design school arguably had become one of the most preeminent programs in the country during the late 1930s and 1940s with the arrival of Walter Gropius in 1937, known as the founder of the Bauhaus school in Germany. Other Modernist architects teaching at Harvard during this period included Marcel Breuer and I.M. Pei, and many students in the program during the 1930s and 1940s went on to notable and award-winning careers themselves. Riseman was a Yale graduate, but working in Boston during this period would have given him ample opportunity to be exposed to this up and coming Modernist community of architects and designers, particularly since his firm's chief designer from 1947-1950 was Casper

S. Neer, who had just completed a Masters in Architecture at Harvard in 1947 during the time many of these now famous faculty were there.¹⁸

Riseman's initial design for Temple Beth Israel made liberal use of the new Modernist vernacular. The gabled roof with the exposed rafters, the mixture of stone and wood exterior treatments, and most particularly, the "walls of glass" or "view walls" that comprise the north and south sides of the upper floor, are all hallmarks of Modernist design during this period, especially in the United States. Interestingly, the original elevation drawing for the Temple from ca. 1951 (Photograph 27) shows a band of wooden siding separating two banks of smaller windows that would have corresponded to the basement and main floors, but as the construction progressed this wooden band was reduced in size and shifted to the juncture of the two floors in favor of a nearly entire floor to ceiling wall of windows on the second floor. Riseman may have been further influenced in the early 1950s by other Modernist architects whose projects were being widely praised as they were announced in national publications. In particular, the work of Charles Goodman, who designed an award-winning and groundbreaking housing development in Northern Virginia in ca. 1949 called "Hollin Hills" that showcased the walls of glass and the massive stone or brick facades against wood trim may have affected Riseman's evolving design sensibilities.¹⁹ In fact, after leaving Boston in ca. 1950, Riseman's former chief designer Casper S. Neer became especially enamored of Hollin Hills, as both a resident of the development and an architect for additions to those houses during the ensuing decades.²⁰

Riseman remained involved in the Temple Beth Israel construction through the mid-1950s. A 1955 article chronicling the difficult progress of completing the synagogue featured his story and photograph prominently.²¹ However, as funding to complete the building stalled and time wore on, Riseman bowed out of the project and focused instead on other facets of his now rapidly burgeoning career. In 1958, with the shell of the building finally completed but the main floor still empty, it finally was time to complete the interior sanctuary. As a mostly non-observant Jew, Riseman had never designed a Jewish sanctuary before. He felt both unqualified and likely was too busy with other more lucrative projects to make the time to educate himself on how to do so.²² Instead, Riseman recommended noted Boston synagogue architect Isidor Richmond to complete the sanctuary. With his partner Carney Goldberg, in 1949 Richmond had won the Boston Society of Architects' Harleston Parker Medal for the design of Temple Emeth in Brookline.²³ The firm was well known in Boston and to the Riseman family, who, like Richmond, had roots in Revere, Massachusetts (both Riseman and Richmond graduated from Revere High School, albeit a generation apart). Richmond was unable to help the Danielson congregation, mostly due to his busy schedule but probably also in part due to the slim budget being offered for the job. Instead, Richmond recommended they hire his then son-in-law, Maurice N. Finegold (b.1932), who in 1958 was just finishing his Master's degree in Architecture from Harvard and was looking for work. Finegold, too, had studied with some of Harvard's most distinguished Modernists, including Josep Lluís Sert, who taught the masters studio and was a very strong influence, Serge Chermayeff, Joseph Zaleski, and Huson Jackson.²⁴

Finegold recalls that he drove from Boston down to Danielson in 1958 with Richmond and a structural engineer to meet with Sol Baker of Temple Beth Israel and to see the synagogue. The building had problems with some of the columns, which had not been centered properly on the underlying piers. The engineer was needed to fix the structural problems, and with Richmond's recommendation, Finegold was hired to complete the interior of the main floor sanctuary and to blend the structural repairs and other necessary upgrades into the existing design.

Like Riseman, Finegold was a Jew who had never designed a religious space when he was hired, but delved into the task eagerly, studying the history of liturgical art and imagery and creating a space that attempted to fulfill the needs and desires of the congregation while adhering to the Modernist style that had been established as the design template for the building. Finegold recalls that despite the mixed Jewish background of the congregation, with some practicing Orthodox Judaism and others Conservative Judaism, there was little direction from the group as to how the space should be divided. Rather, he was instructed to create an all-purpose sanctuary that would be acceptable to all of the different factions. The result was in keeping with more modern norms, with the bimah placed at the end of the room rather than in the middle, and no separation of space for men versus women. In that regard, Finegold notes that the result was a processional type space, similar to the layout of many churches as well as synagogues. Finegold's goal was to design a modern yet traditional sanctuary, which would suit a variety of needs without arousing the ire of any one faction of the congregation.²⁵

The one aspect of the main floor design that was not routine and somewhat contentious, however, was the request of the congregation for some sort of memorial to the Holocaust within the synagogue, where they could remember the events. So many of the newer members had endured such hardship and tragedy during that period, with many losing family, it was understood implicitly that some sort of commemorative space had to be created as part of the design. Finegold remembers that despite this mandate, the congregation could not decide or articulate what they wanted. A number of somewhat vague or impractical options were floated, but it was difficult for the group to agree, and with money for the memorial design limited, a number of them were ruled out. Finegold recalls that emotions about the Holocaust among the congregation were still very raw, and as a young designer this was his first experience dealing with Holocaust survivors. Ultimately, Finegold's memorial foyer was created by separating the space between the entry doors and the main sanctuary, and several plaques were installed there. Finegold worked on various aspects of the sanctuary design from 1958-1961, collaborating closely with artists and craftsmen to create additional elements such as the eternal light, an intricately designed stained glass piece.²⁶

Both William Riseman and Maurice N. Finegold went on to successful careers after completing the Temple Beth Israel project, and for both men the experience no doubt shaped their future work.

Riseman's early work remodeling theaters by the 1950s had led to contracts to design new movie theater buildings and drive-in movie theaters, as well as roadside restaurants, snack shops, car wash buildings, bowling alleys, and other recreational facilities.²⁷ In 1957 William Riseman & Associates won a national award for their design of the iconic chain of "Peter Pan Snack Shops," which featured an octagonal structure capped by a tent shaped roof.²⁸ Many of Riseman's designs during this period made liberal use of "walls of glass" for facades and contrasting construction materials, building on the Modernist language he honed in Danielson to design recreational structures for the wider general public. In the 1960s Riseman was among the first architects to popularize the "Twin Cinema" design of movie theaters, which went on to become the industry standard and eventually spawned today's multiplexes.²⁹ Riseman's obituary in 1982 made claim that "He was thought to have designed more film theaters in the United States than any other individual or firm," frequently working as the house architect for such large companies as General Cinema, National Amusements, Loews Corporation, and Redstone Cinemas.³⁰ Although Riseman never designed another synagogue, his experience in Danielson helped shape his design sensibilities for the remainder of his long career.

By contrast, Maurice N. Finegold spent the decades following his contribution at Temple Beth Israel working at Anderson Notter Finegold, Inc., a firm that became nationally known for rehabilitating historic structures through adaptive reuse and historic preservation planning. After several personnel and name changes, the firm now does business as Finegold Alexander + Associates, Inc. The award-winning company, based in Boston, worked throughout the Northeast during the 1960s and 1970s rehabilitating old buildings for new purposes, and in the 1980s was part of a joint venture to restore the National Park Service's Main Building at Ellis Island to the Immigration Museum. At about the same time, beginning in ca. 1979, the firm began work on what would eventually become the United States Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C. The initial idea was to rehabilitate an existing federal building on the site, but by the mid-1980s the plan had changed and the older structure was razed in favor of a new building. Ultimately, James I. Freed of I.M. Pei's firm was given the lead designer role on the project, but Finegold and his company were retained as associate architects. Finegold's work for the Holocaust Museum, which stretched out over a decade, rekindled his interest in designing religious spaces and in dealing with issues of heritage and memory. Based on his experience with the Holocaust Museum, Finegold and his firm began to be approached by congregations from across the country looking to build new synagogues. Beginning in the 1980s, the group started to design both synagogues and churches as part of their portfolio, and since that time has created more than twenty new synagogues. Today, the firm is hard at work on a tri-faith campus in Omaha, Nebraska that will include individual yet linked buildings housing the Jewish congregation of Temple Israel, the American Institute of Islamic Studies and Culture's new mosque and study center, and a church for the Episcopal Diocese of Nebraska.³¹ Temple Beth Israel was Finegold's introduction to creating a place of worship, and first caused him to think about how to create a sense of spirituality of place, which he has continued through his career. His role at Temple Beth Israel ignited the challenge of doing more sites of worship for Finegold, and he traces his career interest directly to his role in that project.³²

Temple Beth Israel is a Modernist example of a rural or suburban synagogue. Although elements of its design were replicated in numerous other buildings during the 1950s and 1960s – in religious facilities, commercial structures, and dwellings across the country – the timing of its design and construction provides an early example of what later became a very popular style. It also represents a clear break with traditional synagogue designs from the pre-war era, particularly in Connecticut and New England.

There has been considerable attention paid during the last few decades to the study of synagogues in Connecticut. In 1990, the Connecticut State Historic Preservation Office approved a grant to survey historic synagogues in Connecticut from 1843-1943 (1843 was the first year synagogues were permitted in the state).³³ Of the 46 synagogues included in the survey, 15 were listed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1995.³⁴ More recently, a number of rural synagogues in Eastern Connecticut were described in detail in a study about Jewish farming communities prior to World War II.³⁵

Ransom notes that prior to World War II, synagogues in Connecticut could be divided into three categories: 1) simple country synagogues built for small groups of primarily Orthodox Jews, whose prohibition of travel on the Sabbath meant only residents from a limited distance could participate; 2) mixed-use buildings that began as churches and then were converted to synagogues (which in the twentieth century reversed course as many communities with dwindling Jewish populations sold their synagogues to newer, predominantly African-American congregations; and 3) large urban buildings constructed solely as synagogues in areas with large Jewish populations.³⁶

Temple Beth Israel is most closely related to the country synagogue tradition, with several key differences. First, the number of congregants in the area dictated that Temple Beth Israel needed to be larger than most rural synagogues, and the mix of Orthodox and Conservative traditions within the group meant that the space needed to be more all-purpose than earlier examples that required separate spheres for men and women. Most rural synagogues also were constructed of wood, a natural choice of that era. However, Temple Beth Israel used more modern materials of primarily concrete, stone, and glass, reflecting contemporary building practices of the time. Despite these differences, however, decorative elements of the Temple are very similar to those found throughout historic synagogues in Connecticut and around the world: the Star of David motif, the twin Ten Commandments tablets, the monumental and very common Hebrew inscriptions, and the Eternal Light are all consistently common but symbolic features of synagogues, as is the placement of the Holy Ark on the eastern wall, facing Jerusalem.³⁷

Beyond the typical Jewish motifs and features found in most synagogues, regardless of their location, there is no one directive in terms of how the building itself should be constructed. Synagogue architecture through the ages has varied according to popular styles of the time. Ransom explains that in Connecticut historically synagogues either harkened back to traditional nineteenth-century European influences, or else embraced whatever contemporary styles were in use at the time.³⁸ He notes that synagogues built from the 1920s through the 1940s often had Art Deco elements, in keeping with the architectural trends of the period. Temple Beth Israel continued this tradition, embracing the emerging mid-twentieth century Modernist design elements being popularized by renowned architects teaching and practicing in Boston, Chicago, New York, and Washington, D.C. The design of Temple Beth Israel also is in keeping with modern trends popularized by the prolific New York City-based synagogue architect Percival Goodman, who designed more than fifty synagogues in the decade after World War II. Goodman's hallmarks included the liberal use of light to illuminate the space, the incorporation of sculptures, paintings, and stained glass artwork into the design, and the creation of "flex" spaces, which incorporated an all-purpose sanctuary, foyer, and assembly hall that could be expanded during times of high need by the use of movable panels or accordion walls.³⁹

Interestingly, considering that Temple Beth Israel was constructed to house a congregation of largely Holocaust survivors, the architecture of the building, like so many other post-war synagogues in America, does not specifically reference this tragic event, at least in its exterior design.⁴⁰ As Gavriel D. Rosenfeld explains in Building After Auschwitz: Jewish Architecture and the Memory of the Holocaust, there was a widespread adoption by American Jews of Modernism as the defining architectural style for post-war synagogues. Modernism, by definition, was a trend that was hostile to the past and instead looked forward to the future. He explains "...modernism and memory were fundamentally at odds with one another in early postwar American synagogue design."⁴¹ However, while Temple Beth Israel's Modernist architecture may not have embraced the memory of the Holocaust, this is not to say that the events were not at the forefront of the congregation's minds. As noted above, when Maurice N. Finegold, the sanctuary architect, was approached by the group, they specifically asked him to design a memorial space within the building's interior. Although limited by funding and a lack of agreement among the congregation about what was desired, Finegold nonetheless created space within the foyer where plaques and other memorials to the Holocaust could be presented. And as Samuel D. Gruber, author of American Synagogues: A Century of Architecture and Jewish Community (2003), aptly summarizes, "...most synagogue commemorations of the time were not in the architecture, but in the decorations, the liturgy, and in the community."⁴² The Temple Beth Israel congregation, while acutely aware of and devoted to the memorializing and commemoration of lives lost in the Holocaust, was perhaps the perfect embodiment of this truism.

To Whom It May Concern,

The Killingly Historical and Genealogical Society supports the nomination of the Temple Beth Israel Synagogue for inclusion on the National Register of Historic Places.

Ten Jewish families settled in the Danielson area during the years of 1924-1948 and started the Danielson Jewish Community Club. During the years of 1948-1950 about 40 immigrant Jewish families arrived.

With the arrival of these families, the Jewish Community Club leadership decided a synagogue and community center needed to be built.

Money needed to be raised for this endeavor. Local churches, banks, and businesses made generous donations. Residents of all nationalities and religious backgrounds also donated to the cause.

Ground was broken for construction of the building on Killingly Dr. on July 22, 1951.

The building is significant to the history and culture of the Jewish people in the Town of Killingly, Borough of Danielson, and surrounding towns.

The Temple Beth Israel Synagogue is already listed on the Connecticut Register of Historic Places.

Killingly Dr. (where the synagogue is located.) is on a side street off of the Davis Park-Broad St. Historic District and faces the Old Killingly High School. The district and school are listed on the National Register of Historic Places. We feel this would be a nice addition to this historic area.

Sincerely,

Re: Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society, Danielson, Connecticut - Application for Nomination to the National Register of Historic Places

To Whom It May Concern,

Please add my letter of support for Temple Beth Israel to be added to the National Register of Historic Places. I believe Temple Beth Israel meets the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places.

The building is of significance in American history and is associated with critical events that have made a significant contribution to our national history.

Temple Beth Israel in Danielson, Connecticut is a special place with a unique history. It is a beautiful building which was built in the 1950s by a remarkable group of local Jewish business people and immigrant farmers who were Holocaust survivors. Many of the members of the Preservation Society are children of the founders of the Temple. They have been joined by dedicated friends who share the desire to honor parents and the founders of the community by telling their stories and developing cultural, spiritual, and educational programs consistent with their values.

The goal of the Preservation Society is to preserve and maintain Temple Beth Israel and to continue to serve as a Jewish house of worship welcoming all who seek to observe and celebrate Jewish ritual and traditions while honoring the founders of the Temple Beth Israel community and, in particular, that generation of immigrant Jewish farmers who spoke Yiddish, observed Jewish rituals and traditions, educated their children and celebrated their new American lives in this historic synagogue. The Society seeks to create an archive documenting the history of the community through books, letters, photographs, oral histories, and other historical artifacts that bear witness to the remarkable contributions of this particular Jewish community to life in Northeastern Connecticut and to collaborate with schools, colleges, cultural institutions and religious and civic organizations on creating valuable and unique learning opportunities.

To Whom It May Concern:

We write in support of an application submitted by the Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society in Danielson, Connecticut for nomination of the Temple Beth Israel Synagogue to be included in the National Register of Historic Places.

The Synagogue is included in the Connecticut Register of Historic Places. It is located on a side street off of the Davis Park-Broad Street Historic District and also faces the old Killingly High School, both of which are listed in the National Register of Historic Places. The Synagogue's addition to the National Register would enhance and complement the Historic District.

Dating back to 1951, the Synagogue has become a significant piece of the rich history and culture of the greater Danielson area, serving as a gathering place for American and immigrating Jews following the Holocaust. Current membership is made up of survivors of the Holocaust and their fourth generation offspring, some of whom have taken leadership roles in serving on the Board of Directors to guide the future of the Synagogue. The Synagogue holds various services throughout the year, including an annual Thanksgiving ecumenical service, which draws over 100 people, and Passover and Hanukkah services. Because the Synagogue encourages religious freedom and embraces worshippers of all faiths, it continues to be supported by the local Jewish community and other faiths. Beyond religious services, members are active in the local community.

We fully support inclusion of the Temple Beth Israel Synagogue in the National Register of Historic Places and ask for your consideration of this worthy applicant.

RE: Nomination to the National Register of Historic Places of the Temple Beth Israel
Preservation Society in Danielson, Connecticut

To the State Historic Preservation Board,

I am writing in support of the Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society's application for nomination to the National Register of Historic Places.

Temple Beth Israel has had a tremendous impact on the community in Danielson, Connecticut. Originally conceived as a meeting place for members of the Jewish faith, Temple Beth Israel was built by Holocaust survivors and World War II veterans who settled in Danielson in the post-war period. In the years that followed, Temple Beth Israel became a true community center for families pursuing the American Dream. Last year, Temple Beth Israel celebrated its 60th anniversary and was designated as a historic building by the state Commission on Culture and Tourism. Temple Beth Israel meets the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places because of its significance in American history and the culture in Danielson.

I wholeheartedly endorse this worthy application. I appreciate your kind consideration of this request. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

Re: Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society, Danielson, Connecticut - Application for Nomination to the National Register of Historic Places

Please add my letter of support for Temple Beth Israel to be added to the National Register of Historic Places. I believe Temple Beth Israel meets the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places.

As a spiritual center, Temple Beth Israel symbolizes religious freedom and pluralism. It is a house of worship. It is, however, important to Jews and non-Jews alike. Temple Beth Israel has drawn support from the entire community in part because it symbolizes what we all cherish and hold sacred – the freedom to pray as we choose. Temple Beth Israel is tied to the heart and soul of our American dream.

The building, Temple Beth Israel, physically houses the welcoming spirit of Americans witnessed throughout the generations. I remember attending Hebrew School and praying at the temple, as a child. One day, I asked my father what those numbers were on the arms of the people sitting right across from us. My father explained, they were Holocaust survivors. He explained in simple terms where they had come from, what they had experienced, and what they were looking for in this house of worship. They had found both a religious and a cultural home within these four walls.

This was my first introduction to the immigrant experience in America. I still remember sitting in the temple that day – the stone walls, the windows, and the high ceilings that housed this experience. The doors to the temple opened and welcomed the weary into this sanctuary.

The temple doors were not unlike the doors in the sonnet by Emma Lazarus and engraved on a bronze plaque and mounted inside the Statue of Liberty – welcoming immigrants with open arms.

"Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door!"

Re: Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society, Danielson, Connecticut - Application for Nomination to the National Register of Historic Places

To Whom It May Concern,

Please add my letter of support for Temple Beth Israel to be added to the National Register of Historic Places. I believe Temple Beth Israel meets the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places.

The building is of significance in American history and is associated with critical events that have made a significant contribution to our national history.

Temple Beth Israel in Danielson, Connecticut is a special place with a unique history. It is a beautiful building which was built in the 1950s by a remarkable group of local Jewish business people and immigrant farmers who were Holocaust survivors. Many of the members of the Preservation Society are children of the founders of the Temple. They have been joined by dedicated friends who share the desire to honor parents and the founders of the community by telling their stories and developing cultural, spiritual, and educational programs consistent with their values.

The goal of the Preservation Society is to preserve and maintain Temple Beth Israel and to continue to serve as a Jewish house of worship welcoming all who seek to observe and celebrate Jewish ritual and traditions while honoring the founders of the Temple Beth Israel community and, in particular, that generation of immigrant Jewish farmers who spoke Yiddish, observed Jewish rituals and traditions, educated their children and celebrated their new American lives in this historic synagogue. The Society seeks to create an archive documenting the history of the community through books, letters, photographs, oral histories, and other historical artifacts that bear witness to the remarkable contributions of this particular Jewish community to life in Northeastern Connecticut and to collaborate with schools, colleges, cultural institutions and religious and civic organizations on creating valuable and unique learning opportunities.

The Society will honor the building's founders by creating a setting in which to teach the lessons of the Holocaust by bringing awareness to human rights struggles around the world in order to educate, inspire, and identify the shared human values of people of all backgrounds and cultures. They also hope to enhance local cultural, educational and social life by serving as an interfaith resource for the community to celebrate the arts, local history and the region's ethnically and culturally diverse communities.

As a spiritual center, Temple Beth Israel symbolizes religious freedom and pluralism. It is a house of worship. It is, however, important to Jews and non-Jews alike. Temple Beth Israel has drawn support from the entire community in part because it symbolizes what we all cherish and holds sacred, the freedom to pray as we choose. Temple Beth Israel is tied to the heart and soul of our American dream.

The building, Temple Beth Israel, physically houses the welcoming spirit of Americans witnessed throughout the generations. Both Holocaust survivors and community members found both a religious and a cultural home within these four walls.

The doors to the temple open and welcome the weary into this sanctuary. One member of the Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society wrote, "The temple doors were not unlike the doors in the sonnet by Emma Lazarus and engraved on a bronze plaque and mounted inside the Statue of Liberty " welcoming immigrants with open arms.

"Give me your tired, your poor, Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free, The wretched refuse of your teeming shore. Send these, the homeless, tempest-lost to me, I lift my lamp beside the golden door!"

Temple Beth Israel symbolizes what is great and sacred about our nation and needs to be preserved. It is an integral part of our history.

Sincerely,

Edith G. Prague

Dear Historic Preservation Board;

My name is Ray Gawendo, I am writing in support of the nomination of Temple Beth Israel (TBI) to be included on the National Register of Historic Places. I am 98 years old and a Holocaust survivor. I can personally attest to the historical significance of this building as my late husband and I were part of the group of founding members that came together to form the congregation. We put our hearts and souls into establishing this building as a house of worship. This was so important not only to its founders but was embraced and aided by the generosity of the greater non-Jewish community. As a Holocaust survivor you can only imagine how moved I and the other survivors felt by this acceptance in our new world. TBI became a special place where many of our members came together to celebrate the starting over of our new lives, to observe our faith, celebrate our holidays and life cycle events and most importantly, a place to raise our children in a Jewish setting free from of persecution. I am honored to have the opportunity to encourage you to nominate this most deserving property to the National Register.

Sincerely,

Ray Gawendo

RE: Temple Beth Israel, 39 Killingly Drive, Danielson, CT

To Whom It May Concern:

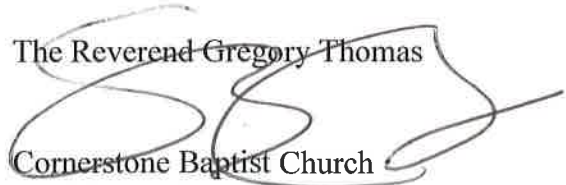

I have been a part of the Interfaith Community here in Danielson/Brooklyn since being called to pastor the Cornerstone Baptist Church on Broad St. There is a rich and abiding relationship between the Faith Communities that include Mainline Protestant churches, the Catholic Church and the Jewish faith community at Temple Beth Israel. I have led many churches in Maine and Connecticut, and have never seen such caring interfaith cooperation and shared social concern.

I believe that a great deal of credit for this stems from the history of Temple Beth Israel's involvement with the community over many decades. From the efforts of the non-Jewish community members working with an immigrant Jewish population at the time of Europe's calamitous war against the evil of Nazi Germany, to a sharing of commonality as expressed in an interfaith Thanksgiving service that has been a yearly event for decades, Temple Beth Israel (TBI) has been at the center of much of this area's interfaith cooperation.

In the past year alone, TBI welcomed interfaith worshipers on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur as well as on the first night of Hanukkah, reminding Jews and Gentiles alike of the story of God's love for the world, and our responsibility to care for it and each other.

I enthusiastically support the application for recognition on the National Historic Register because the building represents an important chapter in the history of the community and an important learning opportunity for the country. It hosts one of the finest examples of interfaith/multicultural cooperation and fellowship I know of.

Re: Temple Beth Israel Preservation Society, Danielson, Connecticut -
Application for Nomination to the National Register of Historic Places

Please add my letter of support for Temple Beth Israel to be added to the National Register of Historic Places. I believe Temple Beth Israel meets the criteria for listing on the National Register of Historic Places as a property associated with events, activities and developments that were important in the past.

Temple Beth Israel is located in Danielson, Connecticut, a town nestled in the northeastern corner, where survivors of the Holocaust found a home and contributed to the life of the surrounding community. Business people and farmers, they worked to begin life anew, and built a community of faith. In the 1950s Temple Beth Israel was constructed. Many of the Preservation Society members are children of these founding members of the Temple.

For members of the Federated Church of Christ in Brooklyn, Temple Beth Israel has played and continues to play a significant role in the spiritual life of the community. For fifty-seven years, Temple Beth Israel and the Federated Church of Christ have jointly held an annual Thanksgiving service. It is an interfaith service that seeks to honor the many spiritual paths and opens a door of understanding and cooperation between faiths. Temple Beth Israel also invites the community to its annual Seder, a valuable and unique learning opportunity for people of diverse faiths to come together. These are just two significant examples of Temple Beth Israel's role as an interfaith resource for the community, promoting understanding not only of their faith, but also the history of their founders and the role they played in the life and growth of the surrounding community. Freedom to practice one's faith, exemplified by Temple Beth Israel, is a vital part of our nation's history, indeed the original dream of those who came to these shores.

Temple Beth Israel can be seen as a symbol of this dream of freedom – a dream that must not die, but be preserved.
