Amel H. Koop House

Lancaster, Nebraska

Name of PropertyDescription

Summary Paragraph (Briefly describe the general characteristics of the property, such as its location, type, style, method of construction, setting, size, and significant features. Indicate whether the property has historic integrity.)

The Amel H. Koop House is a 2 ½ story residence located at the southwest corner of A and South 15th Streets in Lincoln, Nebraska, built in 1915. The home is constructed of masonry (structural tile) with brick and stucco exteriors. The house displays a sophisticated composition in the style described as Academic Eclecticism, designed by a well-trained and broadly experienced architect, George Berlinghof of Lincoln.

Narrative Description (Describe the historic and current physical appearance and condition of the property. Describe contributing and noncontributing resources if applicable.)

Located on a corner lot at the end of Goodhue Boulevard (formerly called South 15th Street), the south mall of the Nebraska State Capitol, the house has its principal entrance orientation to the east onto 15th Street, with a secondary but important façade north towards A Street. South 15th Street from the Capitol to A Street had been paved and landscaped with a generous center median just three years before the house's construction, the first of the cardinal axes to the Capitol to be substantially improved with a landscaped streetscape¹. The site has a wide lawn to the north by A Street, featuring a tall gingko tree, and has a large side yard to the south with a mature sycamore between the house and a brick garage. Younger conifers are planted between the garage and alley, which is bordered by a brick wall with a stone coping. At one time, the boundary wall extended north to frame the side yard.² The wall is a contributing feature, as is a period garage south of the house. The single-story, flat-roofed garage faces 15th Street and matches the house's brickwork. Above the wide, modern garage door, a tile visor roof and shallow triangular parapet (now sheathed with wide vinyl siding) top the front (east) façade of the garage.

The Koop House has a red brick and stucco exterior with limestone trim. The structural-tile walls of the exterior are clad at the base with several courses of smooth, red pressed bricks, topped with a rowlock course. The remainder of the first story is clad in darker, rough-textured red-brown bricks, extending to a wide wooden stringcourse which separates the first and second stories. The molded string course projects out several inches, which is met on the upper story by a flared base in the stuccowork. As is characteristic of Prairie School houses, stucco covers the second story to the eaves, with a diamond-shaped brick detail emerging from the stucco at the main roof peaks. The wide eaves have stuccoed soffits with substantial wooden brackets. The complex, interlocking gable roofs are permanently finished in red tiles.

While the roof pattern is virtually a cross-gable, the north-south ridge is the predominant roof, its ridge extending the width of the house. Its east pitch continues on the northeast all the way to cover the east entry porch, with the eaves at the one-story level, while the west pitch terminates at a two-story height. The large east-west roof is positioned within the east pitch of the main roof, there resembling an oversized dormer. On the west pitch of the main roof, a hipped-roof true dormer provides three small windows at the attic level.

The principal, east façade features an off-center porch projecting from the facade with square brick piers. The porch is roofed with an extended pitch of the house's main gable roof, cut back over the south half of the porch to provide a second floor balcony over the porch. The east front entrance, accessed by the porch, consists of an oak door with transom and side lights. The door and windows have beveled glass and a rectilinear pattern of muntins. To the south of the porch is a projecting bay window with single pane windows and stained glass transoms. At the south end of the façade, trios of narrow windows on the first and second floor light a sun room and sleeping porch, respectively. Centered within the front facing gable on the second floor is a symmetrical pattern of double hung windows flanking a small central window. On the left, the double hung window features a planter box. An attic-level row of three small windows is centered within the gable.

The north façade towards A Street is highly visible but secondary to the east entrance facade. Large single pane operable sash windows with stone sills adorn the first floor. A symmetrical pattern of double-hung windows with planter boxes flank a brick ornament protruding from the stucco on the second floor. As on the east façade, a row of three small windows is centered within the gable at the attic level, beneath a projecting wall section, flanked by the top pair of brackets. Also on the north side, an exterior stairwell was added in the late 1970s to provide access to the basement.

The west side of the house is positioned close against the west property line and the neighboring driveway. The adjacent houses stand approximately 12 feet apart, and their wide eaves cover about half of that separation. The materials of the west side of Koop House match the street facades, except that a stuccoed oriel window projects near the center of the façade at a mid-story level, above a side entrance. The oriel has a tile hipped roof, as does the dormer in the west pitch of the main roof.

The south façade towards the garage and alley features nearly continuous bands of windows on both first and second stories. On the lower story, the east side is sunroom, while the west side offers an entrance flanked by windows, onto a rear porch. The uppers story has a sleeping porch above the sunroom, under its own gable roof. The main block of the house is recessed behind the porch and rises to the full two-and-one-half story height.

The interior has large rooms on the main floor, including a living room immediately inside the main, east entrance, with a beamed ceiling, large crown moldings and a brick fireplace on the south side. The north trio of windows facing the Capitol are single-pane openings, framed with simple dark woodwork that extends below the sills to the baseboard level.

The central fireplace is built of the same rough-textured brick as the exterior, laid up in a modified Flemish bond. A thick oak mantel rests on two massive oak blocks, and is topped by a large mirror framed in a wide oak frame. The hearth is paved with square tiles of a mottled green and reddish glaze.

Open doorways to each side of the fireplace link the living room to the dining room on the south, which has a similar fireplace back-to-back with that of the living room. The dining room has a beamed ceiling with broad beams that meet and form coffers at each corner, into which are set light fixtures with exposed bulbs. The windows of the dining room include stained glass transoms in the east bay window, and stained glass windows and bevel-glass French doors opening onto the south sunroom.

Two other small rooms make up the remainder of the first floor--a small kitchen is set in the southwest corner, which also provides access to the rear porch, and a possible library in the northwest corner. The latter room has been converted to a bathroom but still displays elaborate wide and deep oak cornices composed of complex moldings.

The staircase to the second floor rises from the west side of the living room to a landing in the west oriel. Its three windows are stained glass, with a sailing ship figured in the central sash. The upper floor has a bathroom, several bedrooms, and a large south sleeping porch.

Both the attic and the basement are ample and well-lit with several windows.

Narrative Statement of Significance (Provide at least one paragraph for each area of significance.)Academic Eclecticism

The McAlestes point out in A Field Guide to American Houses that while “Most American houses have been built in one of the many architectural styles outlined in the preceding sections...” a smaller number of residences “do not fit neatly into one of these...categories but, instead, have characteristics of two or more styles....Many architects and builders experimented with fanciful combinations of...styles...”³ Richard Longstreth argues that among the most experienced architects, this was not random experimentation, but rather was based on a recognition that “given the enormous amount of historical information that had been discovered during the last hundred years [the 19th century],” architectural innovation as an “unconscious process...was conceded to be forever lost.”⁴ Instead, universal design principles could be derived from an understanding of diverse periods, and “By drawing from a variety of sources and synthesizing them into designs that were decisively new, the architects removed their work from ties to a single period or place.”⁵ He calls this stylistic approach “academic eclecticism” and explains that “It provided ways to expand the possibilities of creative design without abandoning ties to tradition.”⁶

In Lincoln, architects such as Ferdinand C. Fiske and George A. Berlinghof brought formal education and developed deep experience through their long practices, and typically designed in a broad range of period revival styles. In the early 20th century, Fiske simultaneously designed Mission Revival, Shingle Style, and Tudor Revival residences, while his school buildings included Neo-classical Revival Whittier Junior High School and Elizabethan Revival Elliott and Prescott Elementary Schools.

Berlinghof’s county courthouses evolved from Richardson Romanesque to Beaux Arts Neo-classical to a stripped-down Neo-classical in the course of his long career. His residential designs had a similar progression, from Queen Anne and Chatequesque in the late 19th century, to the Neo-classical A. O. Thomas House⁷ in Kearney, Nebraska in the early 20th. His Lincoln residences included the Renaissance Revival John Yost House⁸ in 1912 and a bungalow of 1918 for builder R. O. Stake⁹. But both Fiske and Berlinghof also produced a few eclectic combinations, especially in residential designs, that demonstrate the McAlestes’ and Longstreth’s observations.

On the 1900 block of B Street in Lincoln’s Mount Emerald District, in 1915-1916 Fiske designed side-by-side the Renaissance Revival Whitney-Stephenson-Merritt House (1965 B St.) and the Tudor Revival Don Love House (1953 B St.), while across the street his design of 1914 for Senator Elmer Burkett (1944 B St.) combined stylistic elements in a highly eclectic but well-balanced fashion.

Amel H. Koop HouseName of Property

A few blocks west at 1601 A Street, Fiske's design for 1915 for Lola and Robert Funk sweeps down to a bungalow-like one-story eave on the front, while the rear of the house rises to a full two stories. Instead of a bungalow porch, the front entrance is acknowledged with just a subtle eyebrow curve in the eave.

One block west of 1601 A Street, the Amel H. Koop House stands at the southwest corner of the intersection of 15th and A Streets. The richly textured, red-tile roof has almost playful complexity, especially on the east, main façade. There the main roof sweeps down in a bungalow-like manner to encompass the small front porch, but is cut back to suggest a balcony above half of the porch. A pent eave to the south echoes the roof extension over the porch, while a high cross gable crowns the façade. The secondary but very prominent north (A Street) façade is a full 2 ½ stories tall. The Koop House interior combines a bungalow's interior use of exterior brick, with very large-scale, dark woodwork, and beamed and coffered ceilings. This free-form combination of stylistic elements by an architect who typically designed in very specific Period Revival styles is the essence of "academic eclecticism." Berlinghof's residential works typically display a bold scale and even a heaviness, especially of interior woodwork, but most hew closely to contemporary styles. The Koop House is his most prominent venture into academic eclecticism.

Koop may have developed the house for resale, moving before 1920 to an even larger house in the newly developing Sheridan Boulevard neighborhood. The next owners of the house at 15th and A Streets were the Abbott family, prominent ranchers from central Nebraska, providing housing while their children attended the University of Nebraska. The Abbotts were certainly a significant family in Nebraska history, but their association with the Koop House was insufficient to justify National Register Criterion B. It is noteworthy, however, that when the Abbotts constructed a new, large brick and tile American Foursquare on their ranch in Hyannis, Grant County, Nebraska in 1923, they chose for their architect George Berlinghof, designer of the townhouse they had occupied in Lincoln.

George A. Berlinghof (1858-1944)

George Berlinghof was born in Germany and educated at the Polytechnic School of Darmstadt in masonry and architecture, before immigrating to America in 1881. He practiced architecture in Omaha and Beatrice, Nebraska, and in Council Bluffs, Iowa, before permanently relocating to Lincoln in 1905. His diverse practice included county courthouses in Iowa, Nebraska, and Oklahoma, other public buildings throughout Nebraska, residences, academic and commercial buildings. Approximately two dozen of his buildings are listed on the National Register of Historic Places. While little recognized today beyond Nebraska, where many of his substantial buildings are still in use, Berlinghof was certainly the type of well-trained and broadly experienced architect Longstreth described as occasionally but purposefully venturing into "academic eclecticism."
