Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

This structure's salient feature is its four-columned, two-story, full-width, Doric portico (west elevation) with wide intercolumnations. In its original form the building was almost square, consisting of frame construction covered with clapboards and resting on brick piers. A small half-octagon entry pavilion with baseless Doric columns and with shuttered bays projects from the north facade and is an unusual and particularly significant feature. Originally (See 19th Century photograph) an octagonal cupola stood atop the building's low-pitched pyramidal roof, surrounded by four stuccoed-brick chimneys which still remain. Alterations and additions to the rear (east) of the structure now incorporate a modern kitchen, living room, bathrooms, etc. and a sun room to the south.

The four Doric columns of the portico rest on stuccoed brick bases and support a surprisingly simple entablature above. The west facade behind the portico columns shows central doorways with sidelights at each floor, flanked by shuttered windows of similar proportions and also having sidelights to each side. A balcony resting on cast-iron brackets in a leaves-and-tendrils pattern and enclosed by a cast-iron handrail in a grapes-and-grapeleaves pattern extends across almost the entire facade.

The original plan consisted of a central hallway with double parlors to either side. This hallway includes a stairway with turned balusters and heavy turned newel, a plaster ceiling medalion, and a deep plaster crown moulding. The front parlors to either side are reached by wide bi-fold doors. The right-side parlor features a marble mantle, ceiling rosette in plaster, and deep plaster crown moulding; the opposite parlor is much simpler with wooden mantle and without crown mouldings. The rear parlors are also restrained in their ornamentation.

The additions behind the original block are appropriately isolated from the original construction.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Greek Revival Style flourished nationally and in the South from about 1820 to 1860. With the Civil War and the end of the slave-powered plantation system, the economy of the southern states could no longer support the cost of enormous neo-classical buildings.

This structure is an apparent exception; it is significant for the high quality of its Greek Revival Style design and for its extraordinarily late date of construction for the use of this style in Mississippi. According to Danelle Yates, whose family owned the house from 1906 until 1961 (Deed Bk. 83, p. 266), the structure was built by John Lee Williams in 1868. However, no documentary evidence has been found to verify this claim. E. V. Yates, father of Danelle and owner of the house during most of the 20th century, was a major landowner in Macon, one of the town's leading citizens, and a President of the Merchants and Farmers Bank.
