Lafitte's Blacksmith Shop, erected toward the end of the 18th century, is an excellent example of a French Colonial Louis XV townhouse of briquete-entre-poteaux construction.¹

The structure was built sometime between 1772 and 1791 by Jean and Pierre Lafitte, illicit dealers in "black ivory" (slaves), who according to tradition, posed as blacksmiths to mask their nefarious trade. The small one-story building is now used as a bar.

Present Appearance

Nearly square, the house originally had four rooms of equal size. The original interior partitions have been removed to form a large room for use as a bar. There was no galerie, so that the typical French Colonial double-pitch roof was no longer needed, but the tradition is remembered in the graceful flare of the hipped roof at the eaves. The roof is covered with tile, a roofing material that came into general use in New Orleans after the fire of 1794.

Designed in the formal Louis XV style, the graceful flare of the roof line and the delicately pedimented and pilastered dormers contribute elegance to the symmetrically handled facade of the small building. The briquete-entre-poteaux construction is clearly visible on the exterior where the plaster has crumbled away to expose the soft brick between framing timbers of cypress. Remaining plaster and the exposed brickwork have been carefully stabilized to preserve both the structure and this "historic look."
