The Hattie Williams House is a handsome one-story bungalow. The house has decorative elements employed throughout: exposed rafter ends are sculptured; posts on the front veranda are carved; an oval window is set in the front door; bay windows flanking the front facade and one for the dining room; an exterior brick chimney with corbeled cap; and fine woodwork on the interior, including wood columns set on a hardwood, built-in china closet. The exterior walls are clad in beveled siding. The roof is hipped with gabled dormers flanking two sides and a small hipped dormer facing the front. The house has a basement reached by an outside staircase. The house has been left remarkably unchanged including original lighting fixtures in the living room and entranceway.

a. History

It is believed that the Hattie Williams House was built in 1911, just prior to or during the downfall of the Western Steel Corporation's iron and steel works at Irondale. Hattie Williams, together with Otto E. Staack, operated a mercantile company at Irondale by the name of "Williams & Staack." The business was begun on May 6, 1910, and was located in Irondale's "downtown" at the foot of Moore Street. "Williams & Staack" declared bankruptcy in February of 1913, but, according to one source (Scerving, 1983), the mercantile was operated well beyond this date. Hattie Williams sold the property in 1928 to George and Tora Shold.

b. Evaluation of Significance

The Hattie Williams House is significant because of its association with the owner of a mercantile at Irondale. When the open hearth furnaces and rolling mills were added to the pig iron manufacture, a prosperous business community was established along Moore Street at Irondale. The brick and wood frame structures exuded an air of prosperity. All of these buildings are now gone.

The Hattie Williams House is also significant because of its architecture. There were very few bungalows built in Jefferson County, and this house is certainly an excellent example of bungalow construction.
