DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Billed as the "World's Longest Beach", Long Beach Peninsula in southwestern Washington is a uniquely beautiful spit twenty-eight miles long by one and one-half mile wide. The peninsula is bounded on the east by Willapa Bay, on the south by the mouth of the Columbia River, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. This unusual geographic combination greeted the Lewis and Clark Expedition and has the same impressive effect on today's visitors. All nature's gifts of flora and fauna - including Dungeness crabs, bay oysters, salmon, sturgeon, and assorted fishes have lured tourists to the Peninsula since Jonathan I. Stout founded Seaview in 1881.

The land Stout deeded to his daughter, Inez Eugenia, was chosen as the site of the original Shelburne. Stout's son-in-law, Charles Beaver, was the talented builder of this two and one-half story Victorian house that comprises half of the present-day inn. Opening for business in 1896, Beaver intended the structure to be a first-class hostelry. He chose the name Shelburne from a Victorian novel which he reputedly enjoyed.

The early inn has a basic "L" shaped plan and an intersecting gabled roof with boxed eaves. Windows set diagonally across the corners of the building on the ground floor are trimmed with jigsaw ornament of simple design. Bands of fishscale shingles contrast with the standard wooden shingles that cover most of the exterior surface. Small panes of colored glass in primary colors add a touch of brilliance to third story rooms. Originally the Shelburne was painted a pale yellow, but is now a deep green with white decorative trim.

In 1903 or 1904 a much simpler dwelling was constructed on the west side of Pacific Highway #103 at K street (the present site of the Shelburne). Its builder has not been identified. An easterly orientation allows the early morning sun to brighten the dark tongue-in-groove walls of the interior. There is a sturdy, squarish appearance to this bungalow house of two and one-half stories which is capped by a hipped roof and hipped dormer windows. A bay window graces the southeastern corner of the lower story under a deep recessed porch, and a northeastern window with multiple diamond panes allows light through to the staircase. Standard wood shingles cover this house of twelve rooms.

In 1906 William C. Hoare purchased both homes. Five years later he hired a team of horses to pull the original Shelburne across Highway #103 and turn it to face in an easterly direction. Via a narrow two-story passage, this home was joined to the bungalow already on the lot. The move was significant for it created the Shelburne Hotel which the majority of the Peninsula's residents and visitors remember today.

Landscaping around the Shelburne in the early 1900's was rather sparse. The laurel and other trees and bushes that now ornament the property were planted in the 1920's and 1930's, with additions made by each subsequent owner. The original Shelburne was surrounded by a picket fence. During the 1940's a charming rose arbor was made from a rowboat hull and the present fence of crossed oars was the gift of a Seattle man in 1960.

The inn's newest owners have left the exterior of the buildings in an essentially unaltered state. On the interior they have rewired to accommodate electric baseboard heat in each of the inn's fifteen bedrooms, in the lobby, the diningroom, and their personal quarters. Eighty gallons of paint and some reproduction wallpapers now brighten the bedrooms previously painted in the 1940's. New bedding and English and American antiques of the late 1800's and early 1900's fill the rooms. The windows are adorned with lace similar to those in the early photos of the Shelburne. Samples from the owner's collection of quilts cover each of the beds. The kitchen has been remodeled to accommodate the needs of a modern-day restaurant. The diningroom boasts heavy wooden pillars and it too is furnished entirely in antiques. The door carved by Charles Beaver for the Shelburne is soon to be returned to the inn as a generous loan. The oak clawfooted fainting couch upon which Timothy Hoare's daughter Julia accepted her marriage proposal still resides in the lobby, as does the altar from a local church which, as earlier, serves as the registration desk.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Shelburne is the last of the early hotels which accommodated the area's tourists at the turn of the Twentieth Century. The rest have fallen victim to fire and changing times. The original home and hotel were built across the street in 1896. In 1911 the hotel was moved and joined to a similar structure forming the expanded facility locally remembered as the Shelburne Hotel. The original Shelburne was built on land platted by Seaview's founder, Jonathan L. Stout, and deeded to his daughter Inez Eugenia Stout Beaver. Two buildings, one of ornate and one of typically simple Victorian seacoast construction, are joined in a unique and noteworthy tandem.

Farmer, stageline operator, hotel owner, storekeeper, railroad backer, homesteader, father of five - all merged in the frame of one Jonathan L. Stout. He journeyed to the North Beach Peninsula (the present day Long Beach Peninsula) in 1859. One year later he married a woman half his age, Ann Elizabeth Gearhart whose family founded Gearhart, Oregon in 1848. Together they raised daughter Inez and sons Phillip, Grant, Oliver and Chester.

Ilwaco was first home to the farmer Jonathan Stout. There he also began the Lightning Express Stageline in 1870. Running with the tides, the Lightning competed with the Loomis lines for passengers from Ilwaco to Oysterville.

The one hundred fifty-three acres Stout homesteaded bore his name until 1881 when he platted and named Seaview, Washington. Portland families had already developed a liking for the calming sounds of Seaview's surf. Recognizing the potential for the area's development as a quiet retreat, Stout began building Seaview's first hotel in 1882. Articles appeared in 1886 announcing the grand ball which would mark the opening of the Seaview House. An entertainment hall, small store for camping needs, and stables for horses and carriages flanked this early hotel. In the early years purchasers paid the tidy sum of one hundred dollars for a fifty by one hundred foot lot in Stout's Seaview.

Seemingly permanent success for the enterprising Stout was shattered in the fire of 1892 which destroyed the Seaview House. The flames consumed Jonathan's hopes and the community's pride and joy in a few hours time. Another financial hardship followed three short years later. Stout, Loomis, and others had signed promisory notes on behalf of a local railroad known as the Clamshell Railroad, and these fell due in 1895. After

Following the Seaview House, Stout then forfeited the property to conform with his obligations to the Peninsula's progress. Jonathan L. Stout died ca.1895, having deeded a large portion of his holdings to his daughter, Inez Eugenia.

Married to Charles Beaver in 1891, Inez chose the inherited property as the site of her new family home. Her husband built the fourteen room home and hotel himself, completing construction in 1896. Tongue and groove paneling of fir, popular and available at the time for seacoast construction, was used throughout the house. The name Shelburne was chosen from a Victorian novel Charles was reading during the time of construction. The Beaver's daughter Faye still lives locally and recalls her parents renting rooms and serving meals, thus beginning the long healthy life of the Shelburne Hotel.

Late in 1905 or early 1906 William C. Hoare purchased the Shelburne and property from the Beavers, who soon returned to Portland where Charles continued his law practice. Hoare leased the Shelburne to a Mrs. MacMillan of Portland for the next six years. In 1911 he also purchased additional property and homes directly to the west. He hired a team of horses to pull the Shelburne across Pacific Highway #103, and he positioned it on the northerly half of the property. A covered passageway was constructed between these two homes, forming the new eighteen bedroom Shelburne Hotel.

William Hoare's son Timothy and his family lived in and operated the Shelburne for thirty or more years afterward. Timothy is credited with a persistence which helped him persuade the operators of the Clamshell Railroad to include a Shelburne stop on their run, altering the route to accommodate his guests.

The early years of the Twentieth Century were a period of gentility and simple family-oriented recreation on the Peninsula. Seaview grew steadily as a summer resort and retreat for northwestern families. Splendidly appointed steamships like the Potter transported families, their baggage, often the family cow and other pets to North Beach for a three month stay. They transferred to the railroad at Megler, and were carried west and north from that point to other towns along the Peninsula. Travel including meals from Portland to Nahcotta, the northern stop on the railroad line, was then "four and six" meaning "four dollars and six bits", or $4.75.

Hotels such as the Portland with its rounded turret, the Driftwood, the opulent Breakers, the Tinker (later known as the Long Beach Hotel) thrived during the heyday of the resort industry on North Beach. But fire and progress have taken their toll, leaving the Shelburne as the last remnant of that earlier era. The concerned and openly friendly attitude of the early coastal resort and shop owners at the turn of the century continues in this particular resort area to the present day. Great grandchildren of those early tourist families can still enjoy the simple pleasures of the "inn" experience at Shelburne, eighty-four years after its construction.
