Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Wickahoney Post Office/Stage Station is a one-and-a-half story lava rock house with an attached barn of similar material at the right rear. A wing with a wooden bay window extends from the square dwelling's facade. A porch protects the remainder of the facade. All windows have wooden frames. The shingled roof has seven gables.

Behind the attached barn is a hemispherical concrete oven, and to its right is a board-and-batten outbuilding. A lava rock barn of similar construction is to the left rear of the house and adjoins a stone corral.

This long-abandoned post office is located in a remote desert area. Although deteriorated, it remains intact due to its nearly inaccessible location.

Specific dates 1895-1911 Builder/Architect Dow Dunning

Statement of Significance (In one paragraph)

The Wickahoney Post Office/Stage Station is significant as a well preserved and especially pretentious stage station of the turn of the century. Few Idaho stage stations are extant from this period, and only two of those are constructed of lava rock. Canyon Creek Station, the other lava rock example, has been gutted so that only its exterior walls remain. Located on the stage road between Mountain Home, Idaho, and Mountain City, Nevada, the ranch served as a post office from 1895 to 1911. Dow Dunning, who homesteaded the property and constructed the local stone buildings, served as the postmaster. The building was constructed of local stone, a possible indication of the pretentious aspirations of the original builder. Located in a now-desolate section of Idaho, there was some hope that the area might prosper with the completion of the Mountain Home-Mountain City Road. This stage road, however, did not become a well traveled route. The road served mainly as a supply route for certain northern Nevada mines, close to the Idaho border. However, access was also available to the mines by way of Elko, Nevada, which in time became the major route. The location of the Wickahoney Stage Station/Post Office led to the failure of its development into a commercial center. Its isolation, however, has contributed greatly to its preservation.
