Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The J. W. Parmley is a one-and-one-half story bungalow erected in 1920. Built of local brick and square-cut, rock-faced granite, the house has all the classic features of the bungalow style, including the axial roof, second-story dormer, long sloping roofline, deep veranda and textured materials.

The front facade is organized in horizontal units with two recessed square entranceways; one enters into the center sun porch, the other into the main block of the house. The strip of six windows are double hung, with interesting vertical mullions in the upper pane. The primary entrance is marked with a gable and austere plain brackets (or modillions), and curving stair walls. Stepped bays in the first floor break the flush surface of the side facades. Ornamental details which add to the overall design, include the granite water table, vertical stretcher belt courses between floors, tile roof and rock-faced stone bands along the front pillars. Interior features include two fireplaces built of stones and fossils collected by the first owner's son. The variety of details and massing is controlled in an overall composition of strong horizontal emphasis and small-scaled domestic intimacy.

To the rear of the house is the original double garage built of identical granite. Two entries for automobiles on the north facade, the building has a single door with transom and a window on the east. The structure is covered with a wood shingle hipped-roof.
