National Register of Historic Places
Registration Form

This form is for use in nominating or requesting determinations for individual properties and districts. See instructions in How to Complete the National Register of Historic Places Registration Form (National Register Bulletin 16A). Complete each item by marking "x" in the appropriate box or by entering the information requested. If an item does not apply to the property being documented, enter "N/A" for "not applicable." For functions, architectural classification, materials, and areas of significance, enter only categories and subcategories from the instructions. Place additional entries and narrative items on continuation sheets (NPS Form 10-900a). Use a typewriter, word processor, or computer, to complete all items.

Narrative Description

Building 1071, called the "White House," is located at Camp Shelby, Forrest County, Mississippi and was built in 1938 as a Works Project Administration project to house offices and quarters for the camp commander and staff. It is still used today for administrative offices of the Mississippi National Guard and quarters for the Camp Commander and staff.

The original structure apparently consisted of two buildings at a 90 degree angle to each other. The smaller (western) building measured approximately 21 feet x 49 feet, was covered with a hipped roof, and had an entrance portico facing the street. This smaller building probably housed the offices. The larger (eastern) building measured approximately 77 feet x 33 feet, including a 10 foot wide veranda on its facade (south elevation). This building had an "A" roof and probably housed the quarters for the camp commander and staff. A later remodeling and/or addition on the east side created an unusual and incongruous multi-level roof structure combining several hips with a flat deck section, which was accessed through a door in a second level parapet wall. Another remodeling covered the 20-foot space between the buildings with a flat roof to create a garage. The veranda's east end apparently was enclosed at this time to create an office. The last extensive remodeling of the roof took place in 1989, removing the previous incompatible roof addition and consolidating the two buildings under a single unified hipped roof covered with concrete flat tiles. The original wooden clapboard exterior is now covered in hardboard siding. However, the double-hung windows, exterior doors, porch columns and railing reflect Colonial Revival detailing and appear original.

Currently the building displays many of the dominant features of the Ranch style, including the built-in garage, low-pitched hipped roof, asymmetrical rambling shape, wide eave overhang, and a modest use of traditional detailing, here expressed in the Colonial Revival style. The veranda and windows on the south and east sides have metal awnings. Windows are double-hung, six over six sashes, except for the bathroom windows which are double-hung, four over four sashes.

The original floor plan is unknown. The current floor plan provides two offices, a kitchen, a dining room, conference room, two bedrooms and two bathrooms in the original larger building. The post commander's quarters--consisting of a bedroom, living room, kitchen, and bathroom--is in the original smaller building and retains its separate outside entrance. The interior does not resemble its original appearance since all walls are covered with modern 4 foot x 8 foot sheets of wood veneer paneling or wall paper. In addition, the ceilings are covered with acoustical tiles, and fluorescent fixtures are predominately used for lighting. The floors are covered with carpet or sheet vinyl.

Outbuildings on the property include a detached wooden latrine of recent construction and a gazebo that was built in the early 1980s. The grounds are formally landscaped.

Through the years, the White House has undergone many changes and renovations. But while re-roofing, new siding, and awnings belie its historic architectural character, the building's overall integrity is still strong: its shape and location have remained fundamentally unchanged, its porch details are original, the setting is the same as in World War II, and the building continues to be used as the camp headquarters. Thus, the White House, although altered in some ways, is still very recognizable to those who may remember its World War II appearance. This continuity of place and form is important in establishing the White House's integrity as the best surviving structure from Camp Shelby's World War II era.

Narrative Statement of Significance

Building 1071, the "White House", is significant under Criteria A on the local and state levels, for its historic associations with the important role Camp Shelby played in the training and mobilization of United States armed forces during World War II. Camp Shelby was established in 1917 and named for Isaac Shelby, a Revolutionary War hero and first governor of Kentucky. The post was demobilized following World War I. The State of Mississippi acquired Camp Shelby in 1934 for use by the National Guard as a summer camp. In 1938, Building 1071 was built by work forces for the Work Progress Administration. In 1940, with war becoming inevitable, the United States government reacquired the camp and remobilized it as a federal installation.

At its height in 1943, Camp Shelby spread over 360,000 acres of ranges and maneuver areas and was home to 100,000 troops, making the post the largest training facility in the world. An additional 400,000 acres were leased for additional maneuver space. In all, over a thousand square miles were in use for training. Troops were housed in over 14,000 tents, forming the largest tent city in the world.

Among the famous units that trained at Camp Shelby were elements of the 38th Division; the "Cyclone Division" of Indiana, Kentucky, and West Virginia; the 31st Infantry (Dixie) Division, and the famous Japanese-American 442nd Regimental Combat Team that became the most highly decorated unit in the European theater. Women's Army Corps (WAC) units also trained at Camp Shelby. In addition, the post contained a large convalescent hospital and a prisoner of war camp that initially housed members of the German Afrika Corps.

Soon after the end of World War II, the War Department began selling off many of the surplus buildings at Camp Shelby. Buildings that were bought were cut up and moved off the base or used for scrap.¹ Today, the White House is the only significant structure still standing at Camp Shelby from the World War II era. A few warehouses and service buildings also remain.

Because the White House is being nominated under Criterion A, rather than Criterion C, its architectural integrity is less important to its nomination than its integrity as an example of an important historical event or theme. The White House still retains its World War II use, location, and setting, and general appearance, and it therefore qualifies to represent the significant role which Camp Shelby played in the mobilization of United States armed forces during the war.

GEOGRAPHICAL DATA

Verbal Boundary Description

Property is defined on the north by Jackson Avenue, on the west by Jackson Avenue West, on the south by the northern boundary of a parking lot. An imaginary line extending north-south approximately 225 feet from Jackson Avenue West is the eastern boundary. The property forms a rough rectangle of approximately 75' x 225' with an area of about 16,900 square feet. (See enclosed scale map). A fence currently delineates the boundaries.

Boundary Justification

Building 1071 and its surrounding landscaping have apparently had the same general boundaries since World War II. Since the landscaping forms an integral part of the post headquarters, the boundaries have been chosen to include it with the building itself.
