Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The church at Rumford Point is situated in the center of the village next to the bridge over the Androscoggin River. Constructed of wood with clapboard siding and a gable roof, the Greek Revival style structure has a belfry and steeple over the narrow gable end which is the principal facade. Classical ornamentation includes pilasters, cornice returns and a pediment over the entrance. The belfry is distinguished by round-arched apertures with louvered shutters.

The interior contains trompe l'oeil wall paintings designed with classical motifs. Behind the pulpit is an arch painted to suggest a recessed apse. On the side and rear walls are painted Ionic pilasters. Originally the ceiling was also painted but this was lost when the ceiling was replaced after water damage. A basement was constructed under the church in 1960.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Rumford Point Congregational Church of 1865 is significant as one of only ~~five~~^{four} churches in Maine known to have interior trompe l'oeil frescoes. Although the ceiling fresco which included a view of a dome interior has been lost due to water damage, the painting on the side walls is in excellent condition and the illusionary choir-apse is striking.

The trompe l'oeil work done shortly after the erection of the church is probably the latest known in Maine and may have been executed by Jonathan Adams Bartlett a local furniture maker, musician, housewright, and noted folk artist who was associated with Jonathan Poor and/or Rufus Porter during their sojourn in the Bethel-Rumford area. It is virtually certain that he was the builder and very likely the designer of the church. An amusing quote from a recently published history of the area states that, "During that winter [1865] it was a pleasant pastime of local people to watch the artist as he did the fresco painting on the interior walls and ceiling."
