DESCRIPTION:

The Doboszinski homestead is located three miles east of the village of Willow River in Section 8 of Norman Township. It is one of several farmsteads in this heavily forested area. The farmstead, situated some distance from the township road, consists of several small scale structures constructed around the turn of the century.

The house (1900) is a simple L plan log and frame structure sheathed in green clapboard and covered by a gable roof pierced by two brick chimneys. An unadorned enclosed porch shelters the principal entrance on the east side. The few windows are double hung. Simple end boards, which are painted dark green, are the structure's sole decorative features. A small frame ice house is north of the house.

The farmyard is situated east and south of the house. Buildings include a log hay barn (ca.1895), a log cow barn (1895) with attached log horse barn (ca.1898), and a frame granary (1910). The log structures are constructed of hewn square timbers with dovetail corner-timbering; frame sheds are attached to the hay and cow barns. All buildings have gable roofs. A more recent machine shed, located east of the principal structures, is the only intrusion on the property.

The farmstead, although somewhat deteriorated, retains much of its integrity. It remains in the Doboszinski family, but is unoccupied most of the year.

SIGNIFICANCE:

The Doboszinski Homestead is significant both as a rare surviving example of the subsistence type farmsteads developed by pioneer settlers in the cutover region of Pine County, and for its association with the initial Polish settlement of the Willow River area. John Doboszinski, a Polish-born Russian emigrant, homesteaded the land in 1894, before logging in the vicinity had peaked. The Doboszinskis cleared the land and erected a small log cabin (later replaced with a more commodious log and frame dwelling) and several log farm structures. The family later expanded their holdings, but ceased farming operations with the outbreak of World War II. The farmstead, with its absence of modern improvements, stands as a significant link to the region's initial settlement period.
