- P1.1 not so noticeable here, for instance: the Centre House has a single entrance to the central house, rather than the two usual for structures used by both sexes. One of the two less prominent doorways just behind the main block on either side of the ell, however, appears never to have been used. Although lacking some of the subtleties of form of, say, Micajah Burnett's designs at Pleasant Hill, there are some striking visual effects at South Union, particularly in the concentric round arches of the Centre House. There are also refinements like the superb curves of the limestone gutters of the Centre House. The overall level of craftsmanship, as in the masonry of these gutters, is unsurpassed.
- To the west of the Centre House (already described in an earlier Pl. 2 National Register form) is the Centre House Well House, a double-bayed pavilion with two graceful segmental arches on both sides and a higher segmental arch within the gable at either end. The moderately sloping roof is supported on six chamfered octagonal wooden posts. This has been walled and moved to the back of the Centre House but will be restored.
- Pl. 3 A smaller well house is found southeast of the laundry--the Laundry House Well House. It consists simply of a roof supported by four posts and cross beams. Both well houses were constructed c. 1850.

Pl. 4 The Laundry or Wash House also within the Centre Family Complex is a tall three-and-a-half story building of nine bays set parallel to the road slightly farther back than the rear of the Centre House which is just to the east of the laundry. This austerely functional structure is almost without stylistic features, although the three narrow doorways on the facade facing the road with their inset transoms recall late 18th-century Kentucky doorways.

Originally there were nine large rooms, used by the Church Family sisters for washing, sewing, weaving, drying herbs, and so forth. Each room has three openings toward the road; the center opening on the first story of each vertical sequence of workrooms is the exterior entrance, reached by a railless flight of six monolithic limestone steps.

The finely-laid brick walls are interrupted only by the stone lintels of the openings, including a matching stone over the cellar windows, which neatly break the ashlar foundation. At first glance the openings seem regularly spaced; in fact, a closer examination reveals that those of the center room are closer together than those on the sides, and this subtle hint of centrality is abetted by the just slightly larger lintel of the central window on the second story, which contains the inscribed date of 1854.

Shaker ingenuity exerted an influence on western Kentucky far longer than the 115-year span of the communal colony at South Union. In turn, it was the raw $_{r1}$ frontier spontaneity that first attracted the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing to the area, and something of the same spirit prevails in the colony's current restoration.

Led by Mother Ann Lee, nine Believers in the Second Appearing of Christ, more commonly known as the Shakers, immigrated to New York from England in 1774. Within a period of twenty years eleven societies had been organized in the United States.

The main tenets of this new religious group consisted of pacifism, charity to all in need, cleanliness, industry, honesty in all dealings, celibacy for all members, community of goods, and the belief that Christ had appeared the second time in the form of Mother Ann. Shaker women shared the leadership in both temporal and spiritual matters with the men.

During approximately the same time as the Shakers were establishing their communities in the East in the late 18th century, a great religious awakening which had its inception on the Gasper and Red Rivers in Logan County was taking place in the State of Kentucky. Shaker missionaries learned of this spiritual revival and two of its members migrated from New England to Logan County in hopes of making converts. It was with this background that Issachar Bates and two new western converts, Matthew Houston and Richard McNemar, founded the South Union Colony in Logan County on the Gasper River in 1807.

As with the Shaker settlement at Pleasant Hill in Mercer County in central Kentucky, care was taken to locate the community strategically. Both Shaker settlements were laid astride major highways. The location of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad includes buildings ranging in scale from the large Centre House and Laundry to the minor, but revealing, outbuildings. Although there are minimal intrusions at either cluster of buildings, they remain aligned to the highroad and railroad yet surrounded by the open fields that for over a century provided the economic basis for the community's existence.

Several prominent representatives of the "world" visited South Union during its heyday in the mid-l9th century: James Monroe in company with Andrew Jackson, Henry Clay, and others. But it is ultimately not for these figures' occasional association, but as one of the few remaining tangible survivals of a unique cultural phenomenon that Shakertown at South Union deserves recognition.
